Mr. BRANDEGEE. I simply wanted to suggest to the Senator that in relation to the constitutional power of Congress to clothe the Interstate Commerce Commission with authority to fix wages upon interstate carriers by railroad, as well as to fix rates upon passenger and freight carriage, I think there is some question. The Senator seems to be satisfied that there is no difference in principle between the authority of Congress, under the clause of the Constitution which gives it the right to regulate commerce among the States, to delegate to the Interstate Commerce Commission the power to fix or to regulate rates, and the power to fix or to regulate wages. I want simply to suggest as a matter for thought—for I think there are no decisions on the question, and it is an entirely new proposition, so far as I am aware—that the railroads are owned by private capital, but they are charged with a public use on account of the business that they have entered into. When we delegate to the Interstate Commerce Commission the right to regulate rates it is not to regulate a matter between master and servant——

Mr. HARDWICK. Ah, but let me interrupt the Senator there. When we passed the employers' liability act we did regulate, did we not, the relation of master and servant?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I am coming to that.

Mr. HARDWICK. I shall come to that right now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks he ought to observe that the Senator from Georgia has but three minutes remaining.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. If I may be allowed to suggest to the Chair, inasmuch as this matter has not been even stated, and I am in the midst of my question——

Mr. HARDWICK. I decline to yield to the Senator further right now, then. I have his thought already, I think.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I was going to suggest that when the Senator has finished perhaps I might be recognized to state the question that I am now stating.

Mr. HARDWICK. I hope the Senator will, but I want to finish what I am going to say.

Mr. President, the suggestion of the Senator answers itself almost. Under the power to regulate commerce between the States, Congress has established a 16-hour law. It has been upheld by the courts. Yet that is a regulation of the terms and conditions of employment. Congress has established the employers' liability act, which has finally been upheld by the courts as a valid exercise of their power. Yet that is a regulation of the law of master and servant, just as the Senator suggests this is.

I tell you in principle there is not the slightest difference between the powers. The application may be somewhat more difficult in the one case than in the other, as suggested by my friend from Iowa, but every court in this land, under the doctrine of quantum meruit, as old as the law itself, undertakes to say what services are worth, in the absence of an express contract between the parties. It may be difficult, it may be a matter of opinion, it may be hard to determine justly what the facts are on all occasions, but in principle as a matter of law, and in principle as a matter of morality, there is not the slightest difference between the two propositions. The proposition is to provide for pay for service in both cases.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President——

Mr. HARDWICK. Pardon me, I have not any time to yield. Pay for service rendered by railroads in one case, and pay for the service rendered by the railroad employees to the railroads in the other case, and the principle is identical. The power exists in one case and it exists in the other. In my judgment the permanent, adequate solution of this question will never be arrived at until Congress exercises that power fully from both angles, from both viewpoints.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The minority side of the Chamber is entitled to the next hour, and the Chair recognizes the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] or the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] just as they may prefer between themselves.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I will agree that the Senator from Illinois may proceed.

Mr. SHERMAN obtained the floor.

Mr. THOMAS. Will the Senator from Illinois permit me to offer an amendment?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. THOMAS. With the consent of the Senator having charge of the bill, I offer the following amendment:

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will lie on the table subject to be dealt with when reached in regular order.

Mr. THOMAS. I ask to have the amendment read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the amendment.

The Secretary read as follows:

SEC. 5. Any person who shall willfully delay, obstruct, or hinder the operation of trains upon any of the railroads mentioned in section 1 of this act shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and be punished by a fine not exceeding $500 or imprisonment not exceeding one year or both.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, Congress is approaching an era in legislation which ought to be preceded by deliberation. I have always looked upon Congress and especially the Senate as a deliberative assembly. If the proposed program is executed in legislation pending it will abandon the deliberative exercise of that power which has heretofore distinguished it. It is proposed here within a few hours after the railway crisis is presented to formulate legislation, consider it in the committee, report it to the Senate, and have the bill enacted into law.

There has been in this country a considerable discussion, and much of it is with cogent reason and manifest justice in favor of arbitration. I believe in it. It is akin to the administration of justice which has made the judiciary the great fortress of human right in the English-speaking race. Arbitration is the highway of peace and justice. It begins with the courts, includes disputes between employers and employees and logically in the fullness of time is a substitute for war among nations. Arbitration is the remedy for violence, injustice, abuse of power, and a reign of industrial terror and resulting chaos. The principle is repudiated and law enacted in panic given instead. I believe that the employees and the employers, however numerous they may be, have no more right in the aggregate than the individual. My fellow Senators, I am compelled to arbitrate; others in their individual private relations are compelled to arbitrate. If I did not agree with my employer in the time when I rendered personal service in years past, I was compelled to arbitrate. If I do not agree with my grocer in the payment of my account I must submit to arbitration. Call it by any name you will, it is arbitration still.

There is no difference between a judicial tribunal evolved by the experience of the ages for the settlement of disputes and any other arbitral tribunal. Originally it came from the necessities of men to avoid violence, to prevent bloodshed, to establish civil society, to make it possible for men to live together in a peaceable condition, and that there might be a rule of law under which all might be secure and all might have justice.

We remember in the days of our ancestors when trial by wager of battle gave the verdict to the man with the strong arm. What is the difference between trial by wager of battle in the days of William the Conqueror and trial by wager of battle presented on the floor of the Senate in August, 1916, when Congress is asked to legislate not upon the justice of a pending measure but upon the threat involved? In centuries gone two men fought with arm and cudgel. Now 400,000 men threaten to suspend transportation on 250,000 miles of railway.

But it is said that there has been no overt threat. I reply my desk is covered with express or implied threats of all kinds from the small union to the larger one, from the allied workers of Chicago and St. Paul and of the Mississippi Valley to all who have seen fit to communicate with me by message or otherwise. Here, for instance, is the language of one from the Aurora Trades and Labor Assembly by its president:

AURORA, ILL., August 31, 1916

Hon. L. Y. SHERMAN,
Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Organized labor has its eyes on Washington; it demands settlement of railroad situation fair to all parties; it will not stand for compulsory arbitration or involuntary servitude in any form, either during or after investigation; legislation giving eight-hour day without such conditions should be positive.

AURORA TRADES AND LABOR ASSEMBLY,
GEO. B. STAFFORD, President.
W. A. SEARL, Secretary.

Neither will I tolerate in this country servitude by all under the yoke of a part. I will serve as a Senator for all the people or I will not serve at all.

Within 30 days, Mr. President, in 1913, from the time I took my seat in this body, the same question was presented to me and my files are replete with telegrams of the same threatening character. I passed through an election in 1914. To the credit of the union workman he was not delivered by those who threatened. I will not serve as a Senator in dictatorial servitude from a portion of the American people. I will serve for all of them, or I will never serve another term in this or any other public body requiring my submission to a vote of the people. If I can not be such a Senator I would rather "be a dog and bay the moon than such a Roman."

There are too many in this body and elsewhere to-day, Mr. President, baying at the moon. They see a face in the moon and it looks to them like Gompers, gibbous and full.

I shall, Mr. President, for myself take the course I have indicated. I shall legislate for all of the American people or none. I recognize the exclusive right of no single class, of no occupation, to demand special laws. I detest the attempt made in this bill to create classes to legislate for some and against others. If I can not legislate free from such influences, I prefer by my influence or vote never to contribute to legislation at all.

Arbitration is abandoned, it is thrown to the four quarters of the earth at a time when a crisis presents itself. At a time when a deliberate solution ought to be choice of all men, it presents itself as the imperative remedy. This Senate and Congress deliberately abandon arbitration at a time when it is of value. It could be of the greatest service, but this bill deliberately spurns it as a remedy. After years of agitation, after many earnest discussions that will be rendered fruitless by the passage of this bill, we propose to turn Congress itself into an arbitral tribunal.

Mr. President, if this measure be enacted, by it the Senate instantly converts itself into an arbitration court. It undertakes to write an award in a statute on an ex parte hearing in this body, where time ordinarily is permitted to consider and weigh. It undertakes to conclude in that ex parte hearing the rights of the parties to the controversy by the solemnity of law. It undertakes deliberately to substitute, for the arbitral tribunal that has heretofore settled such questions, its own will and to abandon the field of legislation for that of administrative detail. It creates a precedent which will return to annoy and to plague us in the years to come.

Congress becomes no longer a legislative body. It ceases to be a parliamentary organization and becomes a commission for the purpose of hearing every dispute and passing upon every controversy in the industrial world. It undertakes to substitute for the calm deliberate action of the Interstate Commission its own rule written not as an award, but as a statute when presented in the several controversies as they arise. It proposes to cast the multitudinous and fluctuating stream of industrial controversy into the inflexible mold of statutory law.

Mr. President, if this course is to be pursued, should the Interstate Commerce Commission longer exist?

Why have a Federal Trade Commission? What becomes of the Board of Conciliation and Mediation? What becomes of mediation before the controversy reaches the point where action must be final? All the delegated powers of Congress ought to be resumed. The last argument is presented that they have ceased in their mission, that they have failed in their ultimate purpose, and that Congress has been substituted once for all, a precedent here to settle all future controversies, here to examine all details, and here become the great administrative, as well as legislative, authority of this Republic.

How many are involved? Everybody who renders service, and I know of no one, Mr. President, who does not render service of some kind, whatever it may be. We are all workingmen. Of all who toil our country is builded. I shall not make laws for a few that must burden all.

I have here not only the telegram I have read, but another from Danville, Ill., who says what I shall read, and his thoughts are working correctly along his line of thought. The direction in which he is traveling is known to him and all who have similar purposes in view:

Work for Government ownership of railways. Oppose compulsory arbitration or any form of involuntary servitude.

The Senate is sought to be put under involuntary servitude. I have been sought to be placed under involuntary servitude. I know the implied menace in such communications. In years past at no time nor place, under no occasion, and with no issue presented, has any particular occupation or class induced me to desert my duty in this Senate Chamber and vote for a few and abandon all the rest of the American people to their fate.

If legislation has fallen to that low degree, if we can servilely abandon our duty, if American politics has reached the stage where a few govern and not the many, then we are hastening to that deplorable state of decay portrayed for our future years by Macaulay when he wrote his matchless history of England.

I can not think of it. And however many mistake the commanding duty of this hour, however many are here to catch the accents of the vociferous multitude now shouting beyond the confines of this Capital, and however much we may mistake the signs of this age, we are building on an unstable base for the ages to come if this bill be our precedent and our guide.

If we can not rise to a higher level, if we can not forget our politics, if we can not seek to prevent the Chief Executive of this Republic from bending to petty politics to serve ephemeral purposes on the eve of a presidential election, then we are unworthy of our great trust and the American people cease to be a Republic, for it ceases to be a government of the whole people.

There are many other telegrams of a like kind. Here, even, are gentlemen who play Hamlet. Here are the ones who portray the mighty passions of King Lear. They come with the crippled foot of Richard the Third on the stage, who becomes himself again—the mighty drama of Faust, all of the great men whose talent have been turned to the portrayal of human nature and the teaching of the mighty lessons of humanity through the agency of the legitimate player.

Are they laborers? They are; and I have from them the same request claiming brotherhood with the railroad conductors. If actors, Mr. President, have an interest in having a wage scale fixed and hours of labor limited, then we in the Senate are the same kind of laborers in the great department of human affairs. Ours is no mimic stage. Our drama is real. Their work is largely mental, the better the actor the greater his mentality. Those who rise to the dignity of the masters of their art are toilers. I do not now speak of those who rant and saw the air, who libel the name of dramatic art, and whose activities and talents are the muscular rather than the mental kind. Of them I do not speak.

I now speak in the language of a telegram sent me which I incorporate in the RECORD, dated at Chicago:

In the name of our organization we beg that you urge the eight-hour day at present rate of compensation in the railway brotherhood controversy and oppose enactment of compulsory arbitration.

JOE BIRNES,
Chief Deputy Organizer District of Illinois and Middle West of the White Rats Actors' Union of America.

The White Rats are a well-known organization, having offices in the city of Chicago and many other cities. So the White Rats in due time are to be legislated for before many moons shall have shed their effulgent rays upon the Goddess of Liberty smiling benignantly over the scene of our earthly toil.

Mr. President, the White Rats by the next session will have appeared and demanded an eight-hour day for the drama all the way from the novice to the accomplished genius who portrays human passion for us all.

Where will it end? Nowhere. If we legislate for conductors and firemen and engineers and trainmen, we must legislate for all of them. We cease to be a legislative body and become the receptacle of the grievances of all the employers and employees in this country.

I am in favor in certain occupations, Mr. President, of an eight-hour-a-day law. I have told many men who look out of the cab of an engine that I believe in an eight-hour day. I believe in the limitation in mines. I believe in it in many forms of industrial life. I would not undertake by legislation in the Senate to fix the hours in each individual case or occupation presented. Such occupations in this country are multitudinous. We can not now by arbitral legislative decree here undertake to fix wages, hours, and kinds of service. We can not undertake, Mr. President, by fixed law, general in its application in this case, to settle this dispute, for it is a precedent for others to ask that we begin to administer in detail all the equities and rights growing out of the relations of master and servant.

I agree largely with the Senator from Georgia on that relation.

I am talking upon the broader aspect of surrendering at this crisis in these circumstances, at the demand of 350,000 men, assuming that they are a unit, standing, as Clifford Berryman, in the Washington Star an evening or two ago, portrayed, as graphically as any editorial writer, a figure representing the railway brotherhood, erect with a time watch looking at the Capitol and demanding action within the period named.

Mr. President, no man will get legislation by my vote with a stop watch held on my effort; I do not care who he is. He may be the combination of executives of the railways. I have stood up and talked to them face to face; I have talked to the unions, and I am talking to all of them combined now.

If Congress enters upon this adventure, if perchance at some time in the years to come an effort is made to double the hours of service, to diminish the wages, the power having been once conceded, as the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] so ably argued and logically concluded yesterday, it opens up the question, and it will either be a government of the employer or it will be at last a government of the employee.

Neither would be right; neither would be republican; neither would be democratic; neither would be the chief end for which human society is organized and for which public legislation is had.

Here is a humble bookkeeper in the city of Chicago, I read his name into this RECORD because out of the even tenor of his unobtrusive life, from the inconspicuous character of his occupation he manages to know enough to get the point at issue and how it affects him now and will affect him in the future. He says:

CHICAGO, ILL., September 1, 1916.

Senator L. Y. SHERMAN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

I am a bookkeeper; if one labor union can compel Congress under threat of strike to raise wages of the highest-paid labor 25 per cent, of which I will have to pay my share, where will it end? Can't you prevent this law being passed until everybody is heard?

A. BEHRENDS.

I have possibly a dozen telegrams from men in the humbler walks of life; from the men who are pounding iron in the shops to the men who are directing the operation of the large railway systems in this country, and of the great industrial pursuits of our country.

Who are the railroads? On the 31st of August, 1916, 90,000 shareholders and over represented the Pennsylvania Railroad; more than 22,000 represented the New Haven road. The great railwny systems, the Northern Pacific; the Great Northern; the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy; the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul, including the Puget Sound extension; the Northwestern; the New York Central—all of the great systems have issued their securities, and they have passed beyond the stage of speculation and stock jobbing and stock watering. Their stocks are investments.

So it is a question here of doing justice to the investing public as well as the general public, and how shall it be done? It will not be, Mr. President, by merely, on this ex parte hearing, passing into statutes enforced action, but it will be upon a hearing—before whom? Before an arbitration board.

I believe in arbitration; you believe in arbitration. Still the stop clock is put upon us, arbitration is cast aside and immediate legislative action is demanded settling this question, and settling it how? I shall not criticize anybody. This question has long passed the point of partisan criticism. It is no longer, Mr. President, a question of criticizing the President, the Cabinet, Mr. Gompers, or anybody else. It is a question of whether we shall meet our duty, rise to the high standard of a parliamentary body enacting legislation after due deliberation, or whether we will ignominiously abandon that high function and refuse to create a tribunal that may in decency and in order decide upon the merits of the controversy by an award.

In its essential analysis, Mr. President, this is not an eight-hour-day question; no matter however much we may seek to confuse the issue or to deceive ourselves, I am not deluded; it is not an eight-hour-day law. That is not the issue. It is a question of the increase of wages by paying 10 hours' wage for 8 hours' service; and beyond and above that is the effort by a certain occupation, organized in this way, to enforce upon Congress its legislation in total disregard of the rights of all other people. It is not merely the rights of the railway brotherhoods. It is the sovereign rights of the whole American people.

So, Mr. President, I am looking at the larger question.

I forget my partisan affiliations, I forget there is an election coming on this November or any time hereafter; I forget that in the larger duty of this Senate committing itself to arbitration, creating an arbitral tribunal, so that, as under the Interstate Commerce Commission, justice may be done in peace and in order.

Suppose we had undertaken, when the 5 per cent rate increase controversy was on, to settle by an act of Congress what the Interstate Commerce Commission settled, and settled justly. We would have been in the same condition. Every time that a wage increase is asked for by the roads or a reduction by the shippers or the general public we have opened the door, made the precedent for all these disputants to come into the House of Representatives and into the Senate and demand that we do what the Interstate Commerce Commission has been doing, and doing successfully.

If we are going to settle this question, why not include other forms of transportation? All the inland waterways, all the Great Lakes traffic, all of the coastwise traffic is affected, because their hours and their rates are equally important. Why not, in some way, when we talk of involuntary servitude, invent a method by which, when an agreement is made after due deliberation and an award has been entered, both sides shall be compelled to keep their agreement?

I will not stop to read the statement, but I will only refer to two violations that have been made of an award for increase of wages and compliance with the terms of service by the Seamen's Union, members of the Lake navigation service, within the last few months.

When we do so, we are only opening the way and putting up the signboard along the highway of human trouble to invite others to come in and ask us to render them the same service we have rendered the brotherhood of railway trainmen. They represent 18 per cent of the railway employees and draw 28 per cent of all the wages paid. What of others of longer hours and lower pay? We forget the lowly and help the stronger.

So upon all these grounds, Mr. President, this is an error, an error that transcends the mere petty advantage of obtaining votes. It is not a question of the election of some candidate; it is a question, finally, of basing legislation upon such a sound, equitable foundation that it can survive the test of time and the shocks of human experience. That we are not doing. Instead, Mr. President, of laying it upon that stable foundation, we are putting it upon a foundation of sand, and, like the foolish one of old, when the storms come and the winds blow, the foundation will melt away.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore rapped with his gavel.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask leave, Mr. President, to incorporate in the RECORD some of the documents and telegrams to which I have referred in the course of my remarks.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Such will be the order in the absence of objection.

The matter referred to is as follows:

CHICAGO, ILL., August 30, 1916.

Hon. LAWRENCE Y. SHERMAN,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.:

Great Lakes steamboat lines engaged in interstate commerce ask to be included in any legislation enforcing arbitration before the calling of a strike. Twice since May 1 without notice men have been called out at Chicago by seamen's and firemen's unions, hours of labor or working conditions not being involved; matter of wages only. Seamen's bill compelled marine interests to submit each time, as water carriers must employ in certain capacities only men on which Government has placed stamp of approval. These men since seamen's bill went into effect, as a rule, have become members of labor organizations.

Hon. LAWRENCE Y. SHERMAN,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

SIR: We desire to call your attention to the situation that confronts steamship owners, especially passenger steamship owners, on the Great Lakes.

On Saturday, May 20, at 8.30 in the morning, without a moment's warning, every wheelsman, lookoutsman, watchman, oiler, fireman, and coal passer employed on the passenger steamers at this port walked out. Two steamers of this line were held up until late at night, and one from about 3 p. m. until late at night. Only in a roundabout way were we able to learn the reason for their action. Every effort was made to get in communication with the officials of the labor organizations, but it was after 12 noon before we could reach them. An appointment was made for a conference at 2.45 p. m., but it was a little after 3 p. m. before the parties reached his office. Conference lasted until about 5 p. m., when the unions' representatives left with our proposition (copy herewith, marked "Exhibit A"). This was to be considered without delay and an answer given us promptly, but we did not hear from them until almost 9 o'clock.

This company had three steamers in port, two loaded and ready to leave; one within the neighborhood of 100 passengers aboard. The leaving time of this steamer is 7.45 p. m.; she finally got away at 9.59. The other steamer that was loaded was due to leave at 7 p. m.; got away at 10.44 p. m. The unions turned down our proposition (Exhibit A), and it was not until we signed the agreement presented by them (copy, Exhibit B, herewith) that we could move a steamer.

You will note from our proposition (Exhibit A) that we were ready to pay the wage scale, take back the men that had walked out, and make no discrimination against the members of their organizations in filling positions on steamers that were yet to go into commission. This, however, did not satisfy them. They insisted that the able seamen necessary under the seamen's act must be members of their organization.

The men that we have engaged as able seamen, outside of the petty officers, we had contracted with for the season at $50 per month. The men were perfectly satisfied, and not one of them walked out.

Our objection was to including men that were not members of their organizations and who were not involved in the walkout.

The original of Exhibit B was dictated by Mr. Victor Olander, international secretary of the Seamen's Union, and in typewritten form submitted to us for our signature, and this agreement we were forced to sign before we could move any one of our steamers at Chicago. We signed this in good faith and have kept faith since, never once having had a complaint, nor have we ever been once asked to meet a committee from any organization interested.

We went along feeling that we were protected for the season of 1916, as stated, and at least until the matter of fall wages would be up for consideration. Much to our surprise, however, on Tuesday, August 8, we were informed that delegates from the Seamen's Union and the Marine Oilers', Water Tenders', and Firemen's Unions had notified the members of their organizations employed by this company that their wages from August 7, the day previous, would be $10 more per month than in the past. This affected 221 men, or an increase of $2,210 per month to our operating expenses, without any possibility of our being able to do anything in the way of increasing our earnings to offset this unlooked-for increase.

As soon as we became aware that the men had been notified by the unions of the increase, we called up the officials of the unions and asked what it meant, as we considered we had an agreement covering the season, which was not yet over. We were then told that the committee would meet with us for a discussion of the matter, and a meeting was finally arranged for the following day.

Understand, the delegates of the unions had already notified the men that they would receive the increase. The unions' officials, however, did not come near the officials of this company.

During the conversation after we had gotten together, Mr. Olander was taken to task for not keeping his word in connection with the agreement of May 20. He became incensed and, although we agreed to the increase, called out all quartermasters, lookout men, watchmen, oilers, water tenders, firemen, and coal passers on our steamship Alabama and our steamship Indiana, the two steamers we had in port at the time. Mr. Olander and the other union representatives were finally prevailed upon to come back to our office, and after a lengthy conversation the men called out were allowed to return to work.

The fight between the unions and the organization known as the Lake Carriers' Association—the passenger lines do not belong to this association—should not be used as a club over the passenger lines. We are subject to the Interstate Commerce Commission's jurisdiction, making it impossible to increase our rates at any time without giving 30 days' notice. Then, too, we are in close competition with the railroads in our territory and can not raise our rates unless the railroads do. So we have no means of offsetting the increased operating expenses brought about by the seamen's act, which is giving the labor unions power to force the payment of a wage scale all out of proportion to earnings. The bulk or coarse freighters are able to secure carrying rates based upon the supply and demand. They have no tariffs. Their business this year has been so good that they can afford to pay high wages.

It is said that the unions are now voting on a still greater increase for fall. Just why the wages should be further raised, or why fall wages should be higher than in any other season we fail to see. If anything, the work is easier to perform at this season of the year.

The unions are taking full advantage of the power given them by the seamen's act to kill off the commerce of the Great Lakes. This is being done as fast as possible. We no longer control our properties. The class of help never was so poor as this year. The Government tells us how many men we shall employ and what their supposed qualifications shall be. This has given the unions the opportunity they have been longing for. The men are not better off, as a matter of fact—just have more to spend for drink. The increased crews make increased troubles for the licensed officers. There are that many more irresponsible men to deal with. The percentage of troubles has increased more than the number of employees are increased, for under present conditions the licensed officers have to deal with a general demoralization of their crews. The whole matter has gone from bad to worse, and the end not yet in sight.

It is earnestly hoped that if any Government official has any influence with the labor organizations that they will point out to the organizations the great difference there is between the bulk carrier and the package-freight and passenger carrier, in so far as earnings are concerned, and that such officials will use their influence in attempting to place the wages on a more equitable basis.

Respectfully,

H. W. THORP,
Vice President.

EXHIBIT A.

GOODRICH TRANSIT CO.,
Chicago, May 20, 1916.

Mr. VICTOR OLANDER,
Lake Seamen's Union, Chicago, Ill.

DEAR SIR: Confirming conversation at this office this Saturday afternoon, May 20, this company agrees that it will pay the following employees:

Wheelmen, lookout men, watchmen, water tenders, oilers, and firemen at the rate of $60 per month.

That this rate will be paid to men occupying these positions on the steamers that go into commission after this date, and that there will be no discrimination against members of your organization in filling the positions on these steamers that are yet to go into commission.

Not being advised or aware that employees carried in other than the before-mentioned positions were to be considered at this conference, I am not in a position to take this matter up for settlement, but will be pleased to take the matter up Monday, May 22, at any hour that will suit your convenience.

Yours, very truly,

H. W. THORP, V. P. & G. M.

EXHIBIT B.

THE CHICAGO DAILY NEWS,
WASHINGTON OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., September 1, 1916.

To Members of Congress:

By direction of the Chicago Daily News, I hereby call your attention to an editorial appearing in that newspaper to-day, Friday, September 1.

Very truly, yours,

LEROY T. VERNON.

LEGISLATION BY STRIKE THREATS.

Americans should cherish no illusions in regard to the nature of the proceedings that are now under way in the National Congress. That body, acting at the urgent request of the President, is considering the proposed enactment of legislation for the special purpose of inducing the leaders of the railroad brotherhoods to rescind their strike order issued to go into effect at 7 o'clock next Monday morning. The supporters of the President's program know the price that the brotherhood leaders intend to exact, and they are planning to legislate under duress and a time limit in order to pay the price. Questions of reason and justice do not enter into the matter.

One of the three bills that have been submitted to Congress on the initiative of the President—the bill establishing a basic eight-hour day for railroad employees engaged in interstate commerce—embraces the minimum demand of the brotherhood leaders. Enactment of that bill is declared by them to be the price of peace—that is to say, temporary peace, for they make no promises except as to the immediate future. The passage of the eight-hour bill in both Houses by midnight tomorrow, the brotherhood leaders say, will secure the recall of their strike order. Meanwhile they take a bored interest in the President's bill dealing with mediation, arbitration, and investigation of labor disputes, and the President's other measure, giving the National Government authority to operate the railroads in case of military necessity. They and their sympathizers in and out of Congress do not want either of the latter bills to pass as drafted, and there are plenty of congressional "old grannies" to help them fight the desirable features of those bills when the moment arrives to fight them in the interest of coercion by unrestricted strikes and strike threats.

There is, in short, good reason to suspect that of the President's three bills one is for passage and the other two are for show. The brotherhoods, with the able assistance of the President of the United States, have set out to secure an eight-hour basic day for all their members. If they get what they are seeking, the brotherhood leaders, Mr. Gompers, and the rest, will promptly turn their guns on the remaining measures. Thereupon, Congress, no longer responding to the President's prod, is likely to discover with startling suddenness that after all it is in no hurry permanently to protect the public from strikes and strike violence. In that case the beauties of careful investigation and statesmanly deliberation will receive belated recognition at the Capitol, Congress will make a plausible gesture, and hasten to adjourn.

The basic eight-hour day for railroad workers is to be legislated into existence at this time, if at all, practically by the railroad brotherhoods themselves through the persuasive power of their threats of force, confusion, and widespread property loss. Can the 100,000,000 people of this Nation afford to suffer this extraordinary outrage in order to purchase a craven peace? A peace so purchased, a peace of this contemptible quality, must necessarily be temporary, fear ridden, futile.

The American people should demand at this crisis that Congress refuse to pass laws under duress, working breathlessly against time, because it has been stampeded by threats and political nightmares. The attempt of the four railroad brotherhoods to hold a stop watch on Congress and the Nation should meet the rebuke that its audacious impertinence demands.

LAWRENCE Y. SHERMAN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

The Chicago Association of Commerce urges upon the President and upon the Congress that it is inconsistent with the ideals of our Government and subversive of its principles that legislation should be had in the pending railroad crisis without time and opportunity for due consideration. The questions involved are complex and intricate, and while the Congress has the final responsibility it has not hitherto had either the time or opportunity to consider them. When the legislation occurs it should be well considered and fair to all interests. It is impossible and inconsistent with the dignity of the Congress and of the American people that this should be accomplished under the shadow of the impending strike. We therefore insist that the President and the Congress, jointly or acting separately as may be determined, demand that the date for the pending strike be postponed for such reasonable time as may permit Congress to act freely and intelligently and call upon the patriotism of the trainmen to accede to such demand.

UNION STOCK YARDS, ILL., August 30, 1916.

Senator LAWRENCE Y. SHERMAN,
Washington, D. C.:

The Chicago Live Stock Exchange, representing the live-stock producers and shippers, protest the enactment of the bill increasing the membership of the Interstate Commerce Commission. So far as it relates to the divisional method of disposing of cases, we realize the necessity of additional members, but under present conditions shippers have no appeal from commission orders, and this situation would be further aggravated by dividing the commission and clothing each division with full power. We and all other shippers should be heard as to specific and vital objections to this bill.

We further protest any bill pending or proposed that will result in increased live-stock freight rates, all of which must be paid by the producers and shippers of live stock and not by the public. The live-stock industry is already the subject of a special investigation for the readjustment of rates, rules, and regulations, which is now pending before the commission, and additional burdens upon this industry we consider wholly unjustifiable in behalf of the live-stock shippers and producers tributary to this market.

We ask your aid in the adjustment of the proposed legislation in such manner as to be beneficial and not disastrous to the live-stock industry.

CHICAGO LIVE STOCK EXCHANGE,

The Tricity Manufacturers' Association, representing the manufacturers of Moline, East Moline, Rock Island, Ill., Davenport and Bettendorf, Iowa, expresses its objection to the enforcement on the railroads of this country of an 8-hour day with 10 hours' pay. The passage of such a law, in our judgment, will have a most disastrous effect on the industrial conditions of this country, and the burden of the increase necessary to meet these demands must ultimately fall on the consumers of the United States. Such an action on the part of Congress to burden the entire community because of an organized demand of railroad employees will be unjust. As manufacturers we believe absolutely in the principal of arbitration, and, while we realize that in the event of a strike of the railroads our industries would be affected, we would prefer to suffer the losses we should be compelled to accept rather than see the principle of arbitration swept aside in a controversy of a character so important to the country's welfare. We sincerely hope that you will be guided by the principle of right and justice in giving thought and action to the question now before Congress.

The Illinois Manufacturers' Association and is allied organizations employ in Illinois some 600,000 people, and our investment is enormous. We respectfully demand the protec-

When Congress fixes a wage scale in any industry without due deliberation or inquiry into the facts because of the threatening pressure of a labor union it subordinates the rights of a hundred million to the selfish advantage of a comparative few and places the governing body of this country in the position of being forced under threat of strike into special and class legislation, which would probably be resisted and prove ineffectual in the end.

Urge you to fight for it. The railroad unions have refused to submit their case to arbitration and by threat of a strike are attempting to coerce Congress into passing class legislation without hearing or investigation. If the members of the railway brotherhoods now attempting to dictate legislation were underpaid or overworked, there might be justification for an arbitrary demand for an immediate action; however, they are among the best paid and the best cared-for employees of the country. In their principal demand they are admittedly not asking better conditions or shorter hours, but solely more pay for present work and hours. There is no justification for instant acquiescence on this score. The principle of arbitration offers the sole apparent hope for the preservation of continued industrial peace. The Tricity Branch of the National Metal Trades Association earnestly urges your influence against the passage of any law enforcing an eight-hour day on the railroads. If this matter has any merit it can be settled by arbitration, and the Congress of the United States ought not to be influenced by the unjust demands from the employees of railroads who are willing to sacrifice the general good of the community for their individual interests. We believe in the principle of arbitraton and believe that a strenuous fight should be made to enforce that principle. We protest against the coercion of the Congress into hasty legislation under political stress exercised by a small proportion of our people. We deplore their attempt to require the Nation and its industries to stand and deliver to their selfish demands. If arbitration would allow the eight-hour day, as claimed, the American people would be satisfied and feel that their rights had been considered. The unwillingness of claimants to permit arbitration must be considered evidence of their disbelief in the fairness of their demands.

Political expedience can not excuse the sacrifice of the principle of arbitration, which is basic in American affairs. Arbitrary demands, whether of capital or labor made without opportunity for full consideration, should be resented by every true American.

WM. F. KRAMER,
General Secretary-Treasurer.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Senators on the left side of the Chair have 30 minutes and can divide it to suit themselves.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, if no Senator is present who wishes to take advantage of the 30 minutes' limitation, I will take 5 minutes to sandwich in a few remarks at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator can take 5 minutes or he can take 30 minutes, or as much of it as he sees proper.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I wish this bill could be so shaped that I could vote my views on the more important questions involved in legislation of this character. I realize, however, the futility of any endeavor to shape it toward that end. It has been predetermined by the majority party that it shall go through substantially as it was received from the House.

I believe, Mr. President, that the growing economy in all lines of production and transportation through mechanical invention has brought us to a point where we can and ought to adjust our great industries, and especially transportation, to an eight-hour-day labor system. In expressing this view I am not passing judgment on what compensation should be in such case. I have not the information before me that would justify a conclusion on that feature. I should like to vote this hours-of-labor view into this legislation. But, Mr. President, that is left wholly as it has been in the past—to rules adopted by the several companies. The bill simply says that wages which are now paid for 10 hours of service shall be paid for 8 hours. It would be much simpler in form and yet mean exactly the same thing if it merely said that on and after January 1, 1917, employees engaged in operating trains shall have an advance of 25 per cent over their present compensation.

So, too, Mr. President, I should be opposed to any attempt to compel involuntary service. We have no power to do so, and we ought not to do so even if we had the power. The right to terminate his personal service with another—to quit work—is one of the inherent rights of each and every individual and a liberty which ought to be safeguarded by every free people. As we have no power to compel the individual to arbitrate whether or not he will continue service, neither have we the power to compel a collection of individuals to do so.

The thing, however, which I can not support in this bill is the fixing of compensation of employees by Congress without the slightest investigation of the subject. There is not a Senator here who will have the audacity to declare that he has any knowledge whatever of what would be a compensation that would be just to the particular employees affected and also just to the many hundreds of thousands of other employees of the companies, just to the many thousands of stockholders, just to the companies, and, above all, just to the millions of American people who pay the freight.

Mr. President, I heartily favor a high standard of wages for all labor. I believe that the character of labor which involves greater dangers, greater responsibilities, and greater strain upon the constitution, calls for a higher standard of wage than that earned by other equally intelligent but less arduous or responsible labor. But, Mr. President, I can not blind my eyes to the rights of other employees of these railway systems. I can not forget their need of an increase of wages. I can not eliminate from my mind the right of the farmers of my State who, with only a quarter of a crop, and not one dollar of net earnings this year, who, in fact, with an actual loss, will admittedly be compelled out of their meager earnings to pay higher freights for the increase proposed in this measure. And before I pass judgment on all these interests I want some information upon which to found that judgment.

So far as this particular bill is concerned, I might properly stop right here, but I feel I should express what I believe to be the proper course to be pursued hereafter. I believe the Interstate Commerce Commission should be vested with powers of conciliation; that whenever serious disputes arise between the railway companies and their employees concerning wages or other matters connected with the service, this Interstate Commerce Commission should attempt to secure a settlement of these differences. Failing in that, it should investigate the matter, taking into consideration the interest of the companies and their stockholders, the interest of all the employees of the companies, as well as the interest of the shippers and of the public, and report what, in its judgment, would be a just and fair basis of settlement for all parties affected.

I believe that public opinion, when fortified by a full understanding of the subject in dispute, would in most cases be a sufficient force to bring about an arbitration of differences. In matters of this kind the interest of the public should enter into the equation. The people should have their day in court. And how can they have their day except either through vesting of the power of inquiry in the Interstate Commerce Commission or through the creation of an independent tribunal to exercise such power.

Mr. President, if we have so far progressed in our social and industrial evolution that the law of supply and demand, the law of competition in the labor market, can no longer be properly applied in the field of transportation, in which all the people are vitally interested, the great principle of arbitration should be retained to assure that equality of rights which justice to all demands; and that a tribunal which will present to the public the real causes of difference and be a potent power in inducing the opposing parties to compose their differences, ought to be provided for by proper legislation.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I feel that the pending bill and our action upon it constitute a very grave epoch in the legislative and economic history of this country. Let us for a minute consider how the bill comes before us.

Day before yesterday the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce, having had under consideration the recommendations contained in the President's address to Congress upon this subject, was called into session for the purpose of seeing if it were possible to frame any legislation which could adequately deal with the crisis that seemed to confront the country. The determination to hold any sort of a hearing upon the bill had been arrived at by the committee the day before the hearing was had, at about noon. The intention of the committee to hold hearings the next day was announced in the press of the afternoon before the committee was to hold hearings on this bill. So that upon a bill affecting the affairs of the entire country, the conduct of its entire transportation system, and the interests of all the varied businesses and vocations into which the activities of 100,000,000 people are divided, a few people in the country who had, I assume, telegraphic knowledge through the Associated Press and other news-distributing information bureaus, had a chance to catch the evening train from Chicago, Toledo, Cleveland, and a few of the nearer large cities of the country, and appear before us. Very few people of the general public, who are greatly affected by this bill, had any opportunity to appear and be heard at all. The representatives of the railway managers and the executives of the four brotherhoods of railway operatives, who happened to be present in the city, were allowed to appear.

By a vote of the committee nine hours in all were given to the taking of testimony upon this bill. Three hours were allowed to the railroad side of the issue, three hours to the railroad operatives, the brotherhoods, and three hours to the general public and the shippers of the country. The results of that hearing are here upon the desks of Senators, consisting of a pamphlet which I think ought to be printed as a public document for general distribution among those interested in it, entitled "Hearing before the Committee on Interstate Commerce, United States Senate, Sixty-fourth Congress, first session, on proposed bills in connection with legislation relative to the threatened strike of railway employees." The hearings were held on Thursday, August 31, 1916. The pamphlet consists of 157 pages.

Mr. President, I heard every word of that testimony; but I doubt if very many Senators have had the opportunity, in the pressure of business in the closing days of this session, to acquire any adequate knowledge of what it contains. The haste in which this matter has been conducted may well merit the opinion that the product of our activities in the preparation of this bill will not meet with the approval of the American people and will not adequately protect their interests.

Yesterday the distinguished junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], who was a member of this committee on the majority side, addressed the Senate, and, on page 13556 of the RECORD, he stated as follows:

> But the President of the United States made certain proposals through his Attorney General's office to the Congress to relieve the situation. He proposed that a bill called an eight-hour bill, but, in fact, a bill fixing the wages on an eight-hour basis, should be passed. Why? Because the representatives of the great labor organizations of this country had stated to him that if that bill was passed they would call off the strike. That was the terms that they would not strike on—if you pass this bill recognizing eight hours as the basis of wage to be paid for a 10-hour day—nothing more and nothing less.

He further stated—and I read from the RECORD, on page 13558:

> I wish to say to Senators that this eight-hour-day law does not cover the case; it does not cover the request of the President of the United States. He wanted something in this legislation that would control in the interest of the American people; and if you stop with this eight-hour-day bill, without section 6, you will have a piece of legislation that is merely the purchase price of peace. That is all you will have done. You will have done nothing for the American people, but you will have paid the price of peace. Having that contingency to face, was it not the duty of the committee to put something into the bill to protect the American shipper and the American public?
> The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Connecticut?
> Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do.
> Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, if the Government is purchasing its peace for $60,000,000 a year, does not the Senator from Alabama think it would be honester for the Government to pay it out of its own Treasury instead of reaching into the treasury of some other persons and having them pay it?
> Mr. UNDERWOOD. That is a very grave ethical question, but I do not care to now stop to discuss it.
> I am going to vote for this bill because I think it is in the interest of my constituency, and I shall vote for it to stop this calamity; but when I do it I want to do something toward the permanent settlement of these questions that will be in the interest of the great constituency that I represent and in the interest of the country.
> We felt we could not proceed along the lines of the President's suggestions. The President asked for a compulsory-arbitration act; but the members of the committee—at least, many of them—felt that a compulsory-arbitration act such as had been set before us was in violation of the Constitution of the United States; that it would probably be construed by the court to involve involuntary servitude, and would be declared to be unconstitutional.

Mr. President, the distinguished Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], formerly the leader of the House of Representatives, a member of this committee, who heard all the testimony that we had opportunity to take, states that without an amendment which he proposed to the Senate bill and which is pending to the present bill, providing that the Interstate Commerce Commission shall fix wages, and so forth, this bill will not be in the interest of the American people, but he states that he will vote for it to please his constituency. Mr. President, I can not understand how a great Senator who has had a distinguished public career, extending over a period of more than 20 years in the service of his State in the Congress of the United States, can, on this great, broad, far-reaching and fundamental question, take so narrow a view of his duty as that.

I do not believe that this bill is in the interest of the American people, and therefore I can not vote for it. This bill, as has been stated by the Senator from Alabama and by other Senators, in no way purports to be the establishment of a limitation upon the hours of labor of anybody anywhere. Those who in a panic have advocated it and reported it and who will support it, it seems to me, are seeking to conjure for popularity under the popular phraseology of what is known as an eight-hour day limitation of labor for support to this bill, which, by skillful use of the phrase "eight hours as a standard for compensation for service," does not in any way prevent anybody from working more that eight hours a day, but does operate, as the language of the bill is framed and in view of the contracts that the men already have with the railroad companies, arbitrarily and by the ipse dixit of this Congress, upon such scant information as we all know we have had, to decree that the wages of every man actually engaged in the operation of railroad trains in interstate commerce shall be increased overnight by 20 per cent, and, in terms, declares that every one of these gentlemen, amounting to over 350,000 in number, and nobody knows how many more, shall overnight have written into the contract which he has made and which are now existing a provision that he shall receive 10 hours' pay for 8 hours' work. The construction I have placed upon this bill is admitted by everybody and can not be gainsaid.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I yield to the Senator from Missouri for a question.

Mr. REED. The Senator has just stated that it is proposed to write into the contracts which these men already have with the companies an increase of 20 per cent. Is it not true that those contracts have expired, or are about to expire, and that the time for making new arrangements has arrived; or, to state it differently, is not the Senator mistaken when he says that this bill is an amendment to an existing contract? Are there any contracts in existence that cover a period of time in the future wherein the men have agreed to work at a certain wage and for a certain number of hours?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I am not an authority upon this question, and nobody in the Senate is. There are two or three Senators here who for many years have given great attention to these infinitely intricate and complicated questions of railroad operation and the compensation of their employees, but the great majority of the Senators are not familiar with the question. To answer the Senator directly, however, as far as I have knowledge, I would say to him that the committee has on its desk in the Office Building, in the committee room, perhaps 50 of these agreements which have been entered into between the railroad authorities and their operatives. They are all different. As will appear from the hearing, I asked one of the witnesses—I think it was Mr. Lee, the chairman of the railroad managers—if he could not present for the information of the committee a typical agreement between the railroads and their employees, so that we could get some idea of how their compensation was at present established and what it was. There were placed there, and are there now, little books about the size of a bank-deposit book, the agreements between, I should think, 50 of the roads and their men. I have not looked at the dates of those agreements to see when they expire, and I do not know whether they all expire on the same day or not. I was not going to make the point that this law might be invalid, because it might impair an existing contract. Irrespective of that, they will all soon be running out, and whether the provisions of this act would conflict with any of them or not I do not know. I understand they are generally made for a year's time, and when they do run out they must all be renewed by striking out the term "10 hours," if it does appear in these agreements, and inserting the term "eight hours" as the standard of one of the elements which will determine the compensation of the operatives; and when they do that, all I say is that it will result in an increase in pay of 20 per cent.

Mr. REED. I take no exception to that statement, but the Senator's original statement was broader than that. I have no doubt it was unintentionally made; but the language was such that it would ordinarily be construed as conveying the idea that the railway employees have existing contracts, and that they are by those contracts obliged in good faith to serve at a specific wage a certain number of hours for some time in the future, and that it is now proposed by this statute to amend that contract and change it during its existence, thus putting the men in the position of asking to repudiate their solemn obligations, and at the same time putting Congress in the position of aiding and abetting in that violation of a contract. But as I understand the Senator's later statement, he does not mean to imply any such thing; and with his last statement I have no quarrel.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, just a minute, and then I will not interrupt the Senator. As a member of the committee and one of the two Republican members of it who are in the city and the only two Republicans who attended the session of the committee while there were nine Democrats there, in view of the length of time it takes Senators to say what they thought I said and then explain it to their own satisfaction and so forth, I must ask the Chair to state that I be not interrupted during the rest of my time. How much time have I left?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. About two minutes.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I shall have to take further time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A new rule will become operative at 12 o'clock. That hour has arrived. The Senator has spoken 22 minutes, and of course he would not be cut off.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Of course, I can ask no favors and I realize the binding authority of a unanimous-consent agreement. I shall have to say what I have to present upon the bill in the discussion further of the amendment. Has my time now expired?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator's time has expired. The 30-minute period has been exhausted. From this time forward no Senator will be allowed to speak more than once nor for a longer period than 15 minutes. The Chair suggested to the representatives of the two sides of the Chamber that some sort of an agreement be entered into by which the time should be apportioned that they are to occupy. If that has been done it will be the pleasure to the Chair to conform to it.

Mr. GALLINGER. I suggest to the Chair to recognize one on the other side and then one on this side.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there anyone on the majority side ready to speak?

Mr. HUSTING. Mr. President——

Mr. GALLINGER. I will be glad to occupy 15 minutes when the opportunity is given.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do not think any agreement on our part can change the unanimous-consent agreement to speak not more than 15 minutes after 12.

Mr. HUSTING. Mr. President, in the few minutes of time that I have I can only in the plainest way express my views upon the bill, and I want to do so with a view of offering an amendment to it.

We are facing a situation here in the country to-day that is without parallel in the history of the country. We are attempting now, by legislation, to forestall or prevent something that otherwise would be bound to happen, and so a bill has been prepared, how hurriedly has been expressed by Senators on the other side as well as this, for the purpose of preventing what would be a calamity. What is this thing that we are confronted with? Not a threat to strike but a strike itself which has already been called. This is not to prevent or satisfy a threatened strike. That strike has been called, and unless this bill is passed the strike order will go into effect next Monday. So there has been a general demand all over the country, and that demand is recognized in this Chamber, that that strike shall be stopped.

The first thing to be attended to, in my judgment, in dealing with this matter is to stop that strike. Who wants the strike stopped? I presume the railroads want it stopped. I presume the railroad men or railroad employers would like to see it stopped. The Senators in this Chamber, without regard to party, want it stopped. But above all I believe the people of the United States want it stopped. They are not so much concerned how you are going to stop it, so that it be stopped. The other considerations can be attended to later. The first requisite in the bill to be passed by Congress is something that will bring that result. So I presume these hearings that have been cut so short have been cut short because of the urgency of the matter. Senators on the other side could have demanded a week or two if they thought it advisable, but it seems it is agreed by all Senators and all Members of the House of Representatives that something must and shall be done.

Now, what shall we do? Senators on the other side who criticize and point out the defects of this measure say that this is a surrender to labor. But what do they suggest in place of it? They agree that the strike should be stopped. Why do you not stop it in your own way? Why do you not propose something better than this? It is because you have nothing better to propose than this. Yet you want the result just as badly as Senators on this side and the people of the United States.

So this bill was drawn. It was drawn for what purpose? For the purpose of stopping the strike by recognizing the eight-hour day and doing the only thing that will stop it, and, further, by providing for a commission which shall investigate this subject fully, beginning the 1st day of January and continuing six months as a minimum and eight months as a maximum, and to make their report within 30 days thereafter. So there is not only the eight-hour day provided by the bill, but a commission to be appointed. For what purpose? For the purpose of passing the necessary legislation which ultimately must be passed to settle these questions forever.

Now, why do Senators on the other side recognize the necessity of haste? Why have they not something to propose? Why do they complain that no one has knowledge on this subject in the Senate? Because this has come like a bolt from a clear sky, and they are not prepared to recommend legislation upon this subject other than the stopping of this strike.

The very fact that Senators on the other side admit that they are not informed and have nothing to recommend shows the necessity for investigation and for study not only of the strike problem but of the entire labor problem so far as it concerns the railways and employees before we can intelligently and permanently legislate on this great question. Everyone will agree that while it may be within the right of railroad employees to strike, and while it may be within the right of the railroads to lock out their employees at their own sweet will, the public, the people of this great country, and this Government have a right to insist upon being served; and if it can not be served either by railroads or employees because they can not agree, some way must be found whereby the Government can run itself, whereby the Government, in case parties to this business can not agree, may step in and run it ourselves and for ourselves. If it shall appear that within our constitutional rights we can not regulate this matter, some other way will be found whereby the United States will take over and run these great transportation companies itself.

This is a matter that does not only affect railroad companies or individuals; it affects the Government itself. The Government has a right to insist, and not only a right to insist but to enforce, its rights in the operation of these railways and the transportation of its mail, and some way must be devised and some way must be found. Under no circumstances can these be interrupted or obstructed either by the railroads on the one hand or by somebody on the other hand. If we can not do it, I say, within these constitutional limitations, there is only one recourse for the Government, and that is to get legal control of the railroads either through ownership or in some other manner. So I say a commission is necessary to investigate that subject.

I listened to the argument of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], and I see the full force of his criticism of the bill as it has come from the House, that when this commission gets ready to report there will be no Congress in session and no one to deal with it. Everyone knows, we must admit, that in a short session of Congress a matter of this great importance can not be properly considered or handled or determined, because the program is already laid out for the next session of Congress in the way of conservation legislation and other legislation that has gone over. So at the Congress succeeding or the next session of Congress, either a special or extraordinary session or the regular session, this report comes in here. At the earliest moment it will be six months, or the 1st of July, and the latest will be the 1st of September, and a 30 days' time to bring in the report will bring it in here about the 1st of October, when no Congress is in session.

But, as the Senator from Alabama pointed out, this understanding or this law in regard to the eight-hour wage will cease and terminate, and on that day we will find ourselves in the same situation as we are to-day.

Now, that is the part of the bill which should be remedied, in my opinion, and at the proper time I am going to move to amend the bill by providing that this wage shall remain in force 90 days after the convening of the Congress next succeeding the filing of said report.

If that amendment is adopted, I believe that that answers every purpose, every proper demand that can be made upon Congress at this time. Do you want to settle it now? Do you want to permit the strike to come on, or do you want to stop that strike now? Do you want to take it upon yourselves, Senators upon the other side, to precipitate this strike? No; you do not; because if you did not in truth want to see this strike stopped every one of you could object to the consideration of this bill until after next Monday. You want this strike to be prevented, and then you want to follow it up by some legislation that will take hold of this whole subject and dispose of it and determine it once and for all.

If this amendment is adopted, the people will understand that the succeeding Congress, the opening session of the Sixty-fifth Congress, will deal with this whole labor problem in a way that will take it out of the realm of controversy and will commit the country to some sort of policy whereby such things as this can not occur again. We will be able to put it in shape by that time, and the facts will be presented to us so that we may legislate intelligently upon this whole subject and take hold of it and solve it as the banking problem and other great problems have been solved by the preceding Congress and by this Congress. If the bill is not amended, when the 1st of September comes along or the 1st of October comes along, when this wage scale or wage standard expires by limitation of law, who is going to guarantee that there will not be a strike or another threat of a strike? With my amendment we gain enough time to take care of this proposition.

It seems to me wise to provide that this wage scale shall stand at least until 90 days after the convening of the Sixty-fifth Congress, and that the Congress shall then address itself to the subject as one of the main subjects of that session, that they take the facts that will be presented by this commission which will investigate the subject and apply it to the solution of this great problem, and that then this Congress will be in a position to proceed to legislate intelligently and adequately, and will have proceeded, because of the expiration of the limitation, to legislate in a comprehensive, intelligent, and effective way upon this great subject, for if it is not met and solved it will come up again and again until it is solved. It will not down, because the time will never come when men can exactly measure what is right and fair when their own interests are enlisted and are at stake.

The Government of the United States in the management and control of its railroads must necessarily be supreme in the premises. It must have some authority, somehow, somewhere, and all the time, to see that the instruments of communication, the mail, and the transportation of the country is not interrupted or interfered with. They must take measures so that we will have tranquillity at least at home, and so that we will not suffer the consequences of our negligence and of our own indifference in permitting this condition to exist or to be possible.

I hope the amendment will be adopted. If it is the country will approve our course and will understand that while this bill is only a temporary expedient, that after a free, full, and fair investigation we will grapple with the great problems here involved and solve them as our great party has solved so many other great and perplexing questions in the past few years.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. REED in the chair). The Senator's time has expired. There seems to be a sort of implied understanding that the time is to be divided between the different sides of the Chamber, and a list of names was made of those who desire to speak. The President pro tempore has turned that list over to me. I do not know what the sense of the Senate is with reference to following in order the names as recorded. The first name recorded on the Republican side, as the Chair presumes we are to alternate, is that of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE].

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No other Senator has asked for the floor, and the Chair recognizes the Senator from Montana.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, there are so many who desire to speak that I shall occupy only a very few minutes.

I rise solely for the purpose of making an explanation of my attitude as a member of the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce in regard to one phase of the Senate bill on the pending subject of legislation, which was introduced yesterday, Senate bill 6981. It is true that that is not now before the Senate; the bill of the House on the same subject is before the Senate, and the pending question is an amendment offered to the House bill by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] to delegate to the Interstate Commerce Commission power and authority to fix wages for the railway employees on railroads engaged in interstate-commerce business. That provision is found in the Senate bill as section 6 of the Senate bill, and my object in rising is to say that as a member of the Senate committee which considered the bill, I did not in the committee and do not now concur in that feature of the Senate bill, section 6, which has been offered as an amendment to the House bill.

I made no minority report because the time is short and the procedure is very hurried and it was not necessary. I intended by my vote to show my dissent from that section of the Senate bill. I differed from the majority of the committee on a number of features which were incorporated in the bill but found myself in a minority and outvoted; but I made no minority report because, as I said, the time is so short that I determined to content myself with expressing my dissent by my vote.

But as this amendment which has been offered to the House bill and which has been incorporated in the Senate bill has been very extensively debated and is the subject of prolonged consideration by the Senate I want it known that I am not in accord with the committee, and I take this method of expressing my emphatic dissent from section 6 of the Senate bill, as well as the pending amendment to the House bill, being the same thing. I believe it would be a dangerous and unwise departure from the beaten pathways of legislation. I believe it would be fraught with entirely too much danger to incorporate it into law. I think it would be empowering the Interstate Commerce Commission with entirely too much power and with authority which it was not contemplated the commission should have when the body was created. Besides, it would be a futile act. Manifestly there would be no way of enforcing it. It would be impotent and ineffective; and, even if it were effective and enforceable, then I would be all the more opposed to it, because if free men may not have the right to freedom of contract for their services, at mutually agreed wages, then there is no freedom in this country. None of us would be free. It would be involuntary servitude and I would be utterly opposed to anything of that kind of any form, shape, or character. It would be repugnant and detestable. It would be contrary to our Constitution and utterly repugnant to the spirit of our institutions. Manifestly, however, it would have no effectiveness and would not be enforceable.

Therefore, I regard it as an utterly useless, futile, and vain act and on that ground I am opposed to it. I opposed it in committee; I voted against it in committee; I there voiced my opposition to it; and I take this method in the Senate of dissenting from it; and now announce that I shall vote against the pending amendment offered by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD]. I did not agree to it in committee and am against it here.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Just a moment, if we are to adhere in any way to this program. We seem to be proceeding by a species of common consent which was outlined by the President pro tempore. The Chair thinks he will assume the responsibility, unless it is distasteful to the Senate, of calling the names as they come in order, to the end that we may dispose of the list of the gentlemen either by having them occupy the time or by having a default entered against them.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Before that is done, may I suggest that the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] took the names of certain Senators on this side who desire to address the Senate sometime during the day and handed them to the Presiding Officer at that time, but it was done with no thought that that was the order in which they should speak.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Connecticut is correct. The understanding with the Senator from Nevada is that the four hours shall be evenly divided between the two sides of the Chamber, and I presented to the Senator from Nevada a list of names as it had been given to me representing those who on this side desired to speak at some time during the afternoon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. But not in any special order.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not think it was understood that they would come in the order in which they appear on the paper.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. With that understanding the Chair will recognize the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING].

Mr. STERLING. I was about to say that if anyone whose name precedes mine on the list is ready to go on at the present time, I will not seek the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognizes the Senator from South Dakota, and he will proceed.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, we are confronted with a very grave situation, grave from two standpoints, according to my view. The first is the impending strike itself and the consequences that may flow from that strike when once put into effect and operation. That is one evil; but there is another evil which should give as much concern, if not more, than any inconvenience, any distress, or any loss that may result from this imminent and threatened strike; that evil is the one immediately confronting us here in the United States Senate to-day.

The question now—and, as I said, I think it is the graver of the two—is as to whether the United States Congress is, without time taken for deliberation upon this most important and far-reaching measure, to be dragooned into enacting it into a law now before 6 o'clock on this 2d day of September, 1916. That is the grave question. It is more far-reaching in its importance and in its significance than the other question, the one relating to the material loss that may be sustained by reason of the trainmen going on a strike.

Mr. President, for one I refuse to be stampeded. In conscience, believing in our system of free institutions, believing, as I do, in representative government and the right of Congress to deliberate before it legislates, I refuse to be brought through duress into a support of this measure, however general or however threatening this strike may be.

Mr. President, I am satisfied that in enacting this measure into law in this forced and predetermined manner we are not acting in accord with the sense, the conscience, the judgment, and the love of liberty of the American people.

The Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] a while ago read some threatening telegrams coming from certain limited sources within his State. I have some telegrams from my own State. The telegrams that he read do not reflect the sentiment of the great body of the people of the State of Illinois, for I know them, not perhaps so well as the Senator from Illinois does, but I was raised in Illinois, and I know something of the sturdy common sense and patriotism of the people of that State. The telegrams that I have more nearly reflect the sentiment of the average citizen of Illinois and of the people of the United States, the great body of conservative, sober-minded American citizens, than do the threatening telegrams read by the Senator from Illinois. I read a few of them. One from Sioux Falls says, addressing me:

> It occurs to me that you would be doing a public service in lending your support to any movement that might result in submission to a board of arbitration of all the matters in difference between the employees and the railroads. It looks as though there is merit on both sides of the controversy, and that it should not be decided until those who decide are put into possession of all of the facts.

"Of all of the facts," "merit on both sides of the controversy," and yet we here, in the enactment of this legislation, are absolutely precluded from inquiry into the merits of either side of the controversy, nor do we know the facts.

In our haste, with no time to weigh and consider, the peace which it is believed this legislation will secure will be an ignoble peace, and our action will come back to plague us. Moreover, in the revulsion of feeling which I believe will follow, the cause of organized labor will suffer great injury. Another telegram from Sioux Falls reads:

> This organization is strongly opposed to any hasty legislation in the pending railroad crisis. We believe it is inconsistent that this legislation should be accomplished under the shadow of an impending strike. We therefore urge that a demand be made that the strike be postponed for such reasonable time as may permit intelligent action by Congress.
> SIOUX FALLS COMMERCIAL CLUB,
> L. D. MANCHESTER, President.

Another telegram from a business man, who keeps a retail store in a small town in the southern part of my State, reads:

> Strongly favor settling wage difference railroad employees by arbitration. Use your influence with President to that end.

The only mistake is in the last injunction to use my "influence with the President to that end." Here is another telegram, not from my own State, but from the State of Illinois. It reads:

> The National Metal Trade Association urges your most thorough and impartial investigation of the merits and effect of proposed eight-hour legislation, not only upon the railroads but upon all manufacturing interests of the country, before permitting it to become a law. We also urge that you uphold the principle of arbitration as the only logical method of adjusting disputes.
> W. H. VANDERVOORT,
> President National Metal Trades Association.

But we have not time to go into the merits of this proposed eight-hour legislation. No time for any investigation, let alone the "most thorough and impartial" enjoined by the telegram. It is as though a highwayman said to us, "Stand and deliver." That is the humiliating position in which the Congress of the United States finds itself to-day. Another telegram from Milbank, S. Dak., reads:

> Legislation that would include transportation men only would be discriminatory, unpopular, and I earnestly urge that the scope of the proposed eight-hour day law be extended to include all railway employees.
> A. MITTET,
> General Chairman of the Maintenance and Way Employees of Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railway Co.

But this bill includes the small minority only; the great majority, the 80 per cent, embracing the other railroad employees, who are paid the lower wages and work longer hours, many of them, than these more favored employees, are not to share in the benefits of this bill. Their condition is not to be compared with the men who are making these extraordinary and, we may say, inordinate demands—inordinate not from the standpoint of the eight hours, not from the standpoint of higher wages, which is the real issue, but inordinate from the standpoint of demanding of Congress that they do this now, and this alone, and that without any investigation or deliberation at all!

To what may this discriminatory legislation lead? So far as I now know, Mr. President, there is harmony, there is union, there is good feeling between all classes of railway employees. The switchmen, the section man, is not envious or jealous in any degree of the brotherhoods for whom this legislation is to be enacted—not at all; but enact this legislation, and as a natural result there will be bitterness and resentment. Good feeling between men engaged in a common service will be broken down to the detriment of the spirit and efficiency of this great force in our country, upon which our commerce and the safety of the passenger traffic of the country depends. It will tend to inefficiency in railroad service; that service which, of all others, we want for the public welfare to be safe and efficient.

Mr. President I will read here a part of an editorial in yesterday's New York Times, which is a Wilson paper, and which is doing all it can in the cause of the candidacy of Mr. Wilson for President of the United States; and yet this, among other things, is what the editorial has to say in regard to this strike and the demands of the railroad brotherhoods at this time. The editorial is properly headed "A national humiliation."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair calls the attention of the Senator from South Dakota to the fact that his time will expire in less than a minute.

Mr. STERLING. Very well, Mr. President, then I ask leave to insert the entire editorial in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there is no objection, that may be done.

The editorial referred to is as follows:

[From the New York Times of Sept. 1, 1916.]

A NATIONAL HUMILIATION.

The strike is over before it had begun. The project of law compelling the railroads to increase the wages of their employees who are members of the brotherhoods, falsely called the eight-hour bill, will be at once enacted by Congress. The chiefs of the brotherhoods will then revoke the strike order. It is altogether probable that they would revoke it anyway, or at least postpone its beginning. They have had time to measure the magnitude of the crime they were about to commit and the depth of public indignation it would arouse, and to weigh the consequences to themselves and the brotherhoods.

But what will the President do to make good his declaration in the letter to Col. Pope, that "this situation must never be allowed to arise again"? What will Congress do to empower him to prevent its recurrence? Apparently while Congress is to enact the demands of the brotherhoods, it closes its ears and its mind to the demands of "society," the word which the President employed in his quite mistaken statement that society, meaning the public, favors the adoption of the eight-hour principle. Society has an interest immensely greater than any other in the right and permanent settlement of the present controversy, in the taking of such measures that no controversy of this nature shall ever again arise in this form.

Interruption of railroad service by a strike would be a great but transitory inconvenience. The blackmailing of the whole Nation under the threat of a strike, the extortion from a Nation's legislature of a special act granting the demands of the brotherhoods without time to inquire into its justice or its practicability, puts upon the country an intolerable humiliation, it reduces 100,000,000 people to a condition of vassalage, no longer permitted to make laws that freely express their will, but held up, as the highwayman's victim is held up, and forced to instant compliance with the terms imposed upon them by the leaders of organizations comprising only 400,000 of their number. Contributions in money may be, have been, extorted from conquered cities by armed force. Unjust laws may be put upon the statute books through the agitation of factions or groups strong enough to make their political influence felt. But there is no other instance where a Congress of the United States has been forced to make laws under threat of a small part of the people to do immeasurable and irreparable injury to the others. If such an outrage can be put upon us unresisted, we have lost our republican form of government.

What will the President do, we ask again, and what will Congress do? The greater evil, the greater menace to "society," is this act of extorting legislation by threats. To put up with it would be a disaster to the Nation incomparably greater than any the strike could inflict. Yet already there is a feeling in Washington that the compulsory arbitration bill, being controversial, and therefore likely to be a cause of delay, must be laid aside, while Congress makes all haste to meet the arrogant demands of the brotherhoods. That may satisfy public opinion for the moment, but certainly Congress should not adjourn until it has put it into the power of the President to make good his declaration that such a situation must not arise again.

The minds of the people are pretty well cleared of the humbug that the brotherhoods have demanded an eight-hour day, that there is any quality of mercy or humanity in the terms they exact. The very language of the bill makes it clear that not shorter hours but higher pay is what they demand. "Eight hours shall be deemed the measure or standard of a day's work for the purpose of reckoning the compensation for services"—these are the words of the bill under consideration. Moreover, it provides for the appointment of a "wage commission" to observe the "financial effects of the institution of the eight-hour standard workday." Ten hours' pay for eight hours' work, with added pay for all overtime, that is what the men ask for, that is what the bill will grant. The brotherhoods deceived the public for a time; they appear to have deceived the President. They insisted that their demand for eight hours was not arbitrable. It is the general opinion that the President erred grievously in not insisting, with equal firmness, that they consent to arbitration. Instead he appears to have yielded to their demand at once and then to have employed his time in seeking to compel the railroads to yield. An increase in wages is eminently a fit matter for arbitration, certainly for deliberate examination and inquiry, to the end that justice shall be done. That the President should have insisted on. The railroad presidents proposed arbitration, were willing to arbitrate, the brotherhoods refused. That is the net situation, and the public understands it perfectly.

Meanwhile, since it is conceivable that there may be a slip, we commend to Mr. Wilson and his law advisers a pretty careful study of the decision of the Supreme Court in the Debs case. In that opinion, written by Justice Brewer, the court said:

"The entire strength of the Nation may be used to enforce in any part of the land the full and free exercise of all national powers and the security of all rights intrusted by the Constitution to its care. The strong arm of the National Government may be put forth to brush away obstructions to the freedom of interstate commerce or of the transportation of the mails. If the emergency arises, the Army of the Nation and all its militia are at the service of the Nation to compel obedience to its laws. * * * It is competent for the Nation to remove all obstructions upon the highways, natural or artificial, to the passage of interstate commerce or the carrying of the mails; that while it may be competent for the Government (through the Executive branch and in the use of the entire Executive power of the Nation) to forcibly remove all such obstructions, it is equally within its competency to appeal to the civil courts for an inquiry and determination as to the existence and character of any alleged obstructions, and if such are found to exist or threaten to occur, to invoke the powers of those courts to remove or restrain such obstructions."

Grover Cleveland, in that memorable emergency, did not shrink from employing the full power of the Executive to enforce the law and to remove obstructions impeding the transaction of the Nation's business.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I merely wish to say, in conclusion, that should this strike come as a result of our refusal to enact this legislation under duress it might cause great inconvenience; there might be some distress; there might be some loss of property; but the American people would be brave, they would be patient, they would endure, and the price they paid, though it might be a grievous one and hard to be borne for the time, yet the liberty that would ensue would be worth all the cost.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from South Dakota has expired.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, this is the most important legislative crisis I have faced during my 12 years in Congress, and while I am well aware that what I say is not going to influence the action which the Senate will take to-day, I can not let the occasion pass without a brief presentation of my views. The legislation we are considering is of a most unusual character and results from a most difficult but not unusual situation. Information in the press during the past year has given the general public an inkling of the differences which were said to exist between the managers of railroads and the trainmen; but there was no definite information on this subject, either known to the public or in the hands of Congress, until a few days ago when the President summoned the trainmen to Washington to consult with them in regard to their contentions. The result of this consultation was a definite proposition made by the President approving the eight-hour day, compulsory arbitration, and the power to compel the operation of railroads, which, with the exception of the eight-hour feature, are not included in the bill which the Senate is now considering.

In his address to Congress this week the President stated that the controversy had been existing for more than a year. The natural inquiry one is led to make is: If the situation had been brought to the attention of the President and he had information that there were likely to be serious results, why has he neglected to bring it to the attention of Congress, which has been in session nine months, and in that way give Congress an opportunity to calmly and deliberately consider every phase of the question and to determine a course of action which might satisfy not only the parties in interest but more particularly the interests of the general public, which are involved in any legislation of this character. It must be apparent to the President, as it is to every one else, that no fair and sane consideration can be given to such questions as these in the midst of a political campaign, not to mention the fact that no time has been given to Congress to give the subject any real study. It is true that hearings were held day before yesterday and that they are now in print, but they covered a period of nine hours, and there is not a Member of this body not connected with the committee who has had an opportunity to read and digest them.

Neither the public nor any representative in Congress wishes to have labor employed under terms which are unreasonable and which do not furnish suitable compensation for the labor performed; but it is a most hazardous step to take, from the standpoint of labor, to give up the individual and collective right it has heretofore had to make bargains with its employers and turn the question of the wage which it shall receive over to a commission or to Congress, influenced as it must be by many extraneous conditions. We do not know whether railway trainmen are receiving a suitable remuneration, and we can not know it without being informed of the pay received in similar employments and especially the pay received by the other employees of the railroads. Even if it were desirable that Congress should fix wages, which I do not believe, to fix them without any knowledge of the facts, is a revolutionary step and one which should not receive the approval of a single Member of this body. It may be that these men should receive additional pay, but it is almost a certainty that if they are entitled to it every other employee of the railroads is entitled to an increase and it is as much our duty to guard and protect the million and a quarter who are not represented in this controversy as it is the less than half million men who are making this appeal.

Moreover, Congress must be familiar with the difficulties of financing railroads and operating them at this time. With the general increased cost of operation and the relative lessening of the difference between gross and net earnings, even under present conditions, it is practically impossible to get new money to make improvements and developments which are essential if the public is to receive the best possible service. If this legislation is passed without in some way giving an opportunity to increase the rates to be charged, the result must be that the efficiency of the service, which is all important to the public, will be greatly lessened. But of far more importance than the immediate monetary cost is the fact that the public would be paying it, and the public, therefore, should have a right to intervene and ask whether the payments to be made in this case under these conditions are justified.

In affairs of this kind the public is invariably the loser, for if the strike actually takes place and succeeds, either the public pays more for every person carried and every pound of freight hauled or received from the railroads a less efficient service. In this instance, the increase in wages will cost the public $60,000,000 annually more than the same service would cost if performed under present conditions. As the total earnings of the railroads of the United States last year were about $3,000,000,000, it follows that whenever a passenger travels he must remember that his fare will cost an appreciable per cent more than it does to-day, and that each pound of his freight will be transported at a greater cost than heretofore. In reply to this it may be said that the railroads are earning enough so that they need not increase rates or reduce the service; but if this is true then the railroads could well afford to reduce present rates or increase the value of the service they are furnishing if this increase in pay were not made.

It need not surprise anyone that we are receiving great numbers of communications in favor of or in opposition to this legislation. Of course, labor wants the increase and the railroads oppose it; but it is not surprising, for instance, that the farmer whose granary is filled and ready for market deprecates a strike, or that the merchant who sees the possibility of not getting goods for his customers takes the same view and that they, like many others directly involved, make appeals in favor of this legislation. In doing so, however, they are in the same class with a person who takes a drug to relieve a temporary pain. It may answer their purpose for the time being but it furnishes a basis for a habit which in the end will prove destructive, and it is our duty to not only protect all of the 97,000,000 of American citizens who are not connected, either directly or indirectly, with railroads, but to even protect them against themselves if necessary, for in time they will learn that they are not only paying additional compensation for the service they receive this year but it will apply in all future years, for no one need assume for a moment that Congress will ever lessen an established rate.

This whole question has finally reached the stage where it puts the railway trainmen in the position of demanding that Congress shall stand and deliver. I do not mean to imply that they have willingly put themselves in this position. I have no doubt they would prefer to settle their own differences with their own employers and in their own way, but the President by inviting the managers and trainmen to Washington has not only involved himself and the administration in this controversy but by his recommendations to Congress has involved it as well. The employees, standing on their own rights, insist that unless their contentions are granted before Monday, the 4th, they will carry out their purpose of striking. We need not analyze the probability of this threat being carried out, because we are going to pass legislation; but I for one do not believe that a majority of the trainmen wish to strike. I am confident and have proof that many of them are satisfied with present conditions.

Practically speaking, there is no complaint on the part of those employed on passenger trains; and I am convinced that with public sentiment almost completely against this strike, as it would be, that even if it were ordered it would be of short duration and would result in the humiliation of those conducting it; but, by the course which has been followed in this matter, the delay in bringing it to the attention of Congress, we are put in the position of either assuming the responsibility of precipitating a strike or enacting legislation which undoubtedly could not be passed under other conditions.

It is this latter phase which appalls every thinking man, and especially one on whom the responsibility of coming to a decision rests. The effect of this action on the trainmen is that a large body of citizens are demanding legislation, and insisting that unless such legislation is passed in the form they demand, and within a limited time, they will throw the country into turmoil and practically starve the people into submission. No responsible man can view this situation without serious apprehension. It is appalling to think of the suffering which might result and the destruction of values which might come if the strike were called and maintained for any considerable time; but, on the other hand, if Congress accedes to this demand, it is in effect, temporarily, at least, an end of representative government, and the substitution for it of government by coercion, with Congress lending a frightened ear to the contender which it thinks has the most votes.

If we take this action in this case, what is to prevent, and why would it not be reasonable, to take the same action in other cases? Why is it not logical for other large bodies of organized labor or organized capital to appeal to Congress and make similar demands? Is it the duty of Congress to accede to the demands of organized labor, represented by the trainmen, whom we know are the best paid railroad employees, and refuse to respond to an appeal made by other railroad employees receiving much lower and frequently, in my judgment, insufficient wages? Are we not going to establish a far-reaching precedent, which will come back to plague us whenever a suitable occasion arises?

Moreover, what is going to happen to the industries of the country if we establish an eight-hour day, as is proposed by this legislation? Personally I am in entire sympathy with the proposition that eight hours of labor is a goal which employees may look forward with confidence will be reached in time; but our whole industrial structure is founded on different conditions, and the establishment at this time of this policy by act of Congress is going to not only disturb every industrial relation which exists, producing strikes in other occupations, but demands which if acceded to are almost certain to put us in such a position that at the end of the war we will be unable to compete with any degree of success with European and Asiatic countries, resulting in a degree of depression and distress in this country unparalleled in our history. The employee who is receiving a weekly wage may not be able to see this, and it is, therefore, all the more our duty to prevent action which will involve him and everyone else in the serious troubles which are sure to ensue.

Undoubtedly, if passenger trainmen are generally satisfied, this contention reduces itself to freight trainmen. I am confident that in many cases they work hours overtime. It is impossible, however, to arrange schedules which will not require to some degree such a result, and it is especially so in times like these, when the railroads are crowded to their utmost capacity with freight—so greatly crowded that frequently trains lie on sidetracks for hours waiting an opportunity to proceed—and there is certainly reason in asking that under such conditions overtime pay should be given them and perhaps some bonus should be included in it. But even that phase of the question has two sides, and should be explained by those competent to do so.

Taking all of these matters into consideration, I wish to enter my most vigorous protest against this method of procedure, against the character of the bill we are now considering, and against the time and conditions which have brought about this legislation. It is idle to assume that it has no political force or political effect. We are in the midst of a great campaign, and the action which Congress takes is going to be influenced by the political ambitions of those who are to pass on this legislation. I am not the judge to pass on the conduct of others, but I can not help believing that the railway trainmen in taking this step are doing an unpatriotic act, and one which they themselves will regret when they have had an opportunity to consider it from their own individual standpoint. I firmly believe that it will react on them and that they will in the end not benefit materially by such drastic demands.

Neither do I believe that they or any other body of men can successfully maintain opposition to suitable arbitration. I am well aware that they have objected to arbitrations which have taken place in the past, and quite likely with some reason. The method of selecting the arbitors has been in itself unwise, for the employers have selected one who is necessarily a partisan, the employees another, who is also biased, and these two have then commenced maneuvering to find some one inclined to favor his side. No judicial decision based on a controverted question could be obtained by such a method of procedure or through such a board. But if a board of arbitration is appointed, all of the members of which are experts and who have no possible relation with either side, it furnishes to my mind a suitable means for arbitration and one on which we must stand if we are to avoid unlimited industrial troubles in this country. Therefore, in opposing any form of arbitration, if they do, the trainmen are on untenable ground, a position which will take from them the sympathy and support of the public, without which no cause can permanently succeed.

I should be glad to provide the means to make a careful investigation of this whole question, and when a report has been made to vote for legislation which is justified or is based on the facts; but I will not take any part in putting Congress in the position of standing and delivering. If it has the result which I believe it is going to have, it is a step which everyone who is instrumental in bringing it about is going to live to regret, and therefore without attempting to pass on the merits of this controversy, and even if I approved of every phase of this bill, I would be forced to oppose it for the reasons stated.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, in this morning's issue of the New York Times, which is perhaps the leading Democratic newspaper of the country, there is an editorial which so exactly expresses my opinion upon this legislation that I will ask to have it read and inserted in the RECORD as part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary proceeded to read the editorial.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Just a moment. The Chair thinks he ought to say to the Senator from Pennsylvania that he believes the same editorial was inserted in the RECORD by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING].

Mr. OLIVER. No, Mr. President, this is a different editorial. This is from to-day's issue of the New York Times, while the editorial read by the Senator from South Dakota was in yesterday's issue of that paper.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Very well. The Chair merely made the suggestion in the interest of saving time.

The Secretary resumed and concluded the reading of the editorial, which is as follows:

[From the New York Times of Saturday, Sept. 2, 1916.]

WHERE IT LEADS.

Upon the merits of the brotherhood demand for an eight-hour "basic day" as the measure for fixing wages the public has pronounced no judgment. It could form no judgment, for it was without definite knowledge. No inquiry was permitted, no investigation was had. While it is beyond dispute that the demand was for higher wages, certainly an arbitrable matter, the brotherhoods would consent to no arbitration. In their statement published yesterday they say: "We have steadily refused to arbitrate the establishment of an eight-hour workday, supported in this by the President of the United States."

It is upon the method used in enforcing the demand, not upon its merits, that the public has spoken. There its condemnation is universal, stern, and severe without qualification. It could not be otherwise. In this Republic laws express the people's will, but in the making of this law to increase the pay of one-quarter of the railroad employees the people have not had the slightest chance to make known their desire. Their Congress was coerced by the threat of an immeasurable injury to themselves. What lynch law is to orderly judicial process the method adopted by the brotherhoods, and we have very great regret in saying with quite too much assistance from the President, is to the constitutional method of lawmaking. With one voice and unsparingly the people must and do denounce the means by which this legislation was forced upon Congress.

For the brotherhoods and for the interests of labor it was a dreadful blunder. Progress is not made, it is impeded, by such an abuse of the power to do harm. The French Revolution violently ended the reign of a Bourbon King, but to the Revolution succeeded the Consulate and then the Empire. Excesses committed in the name of liberal progress are too apt to be followed by reaction in the name of conservatism. The gains of orderly progress are secure. It is not so with those got by revolutionary excess and violence.

The brotherhoods look upon Mr. Wilson as their friend. They may have harmed him vastly more than it has them. Such a spirit as has been roused in the country at this time, in the midst of a presidential campaign, is not of good political augury for a party in power.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, if the bill now presented to the Senate provided some way of settling labor disputes in the future I would hesitate long before I would refuse to support it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I ask that there may be order, especially in the galleries.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Let there be order in the Chamber. The galleries are admonished that audible conversation can not be permitted.

Mr. OLIVER. But this bill offers no such inducement. In his address to Congress a few days ago, the President outlined a series of legislative measures which had that aim in view, but Congress has seen fit to ignore all of the other recommendations he made and, apparently with his full approval, to rest content with constituting itself as an arbitrator upon the main point in controversy, and deciding that point without the shadow of hearing upon the merits of the questions involved. This measure simply proposes to yield to the demand for enormous increase in wages and a consequent increase in the expense of running our great railroad systems, and in express terms, while assuming to establish an eight-hour basis, it abandons that basis with regard to three-fourths of the men actually employed by the railroads.

Within the last two days I have received over 300 telegrams protesting against this legislation, whilst I have received but 29 telegrams expressing the opinion of the senders in its favor. Of those 29, quite a number insist that if the legislation is to be adopted it should extend to all railroad employees, and particularly to shop carpenters and shop mechanics, who are absolutely ignored in the framing of this legislation.

I do not want to spend much time in talking against this measure, but I can not conceive why, when the committee was framing the bill before the Senate, it chose to ignore the recommendations of the President with regard to establishing some system by which disputes of this kind could be avoided in the future.

In my opinion the bill is revolutionary in its nature. It is wrong in its fundamental principles. I know that it is bound to pass, but I can not refrain from expressing my dissent from its provisions.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, I simply desire to call the attention of all the wage earners of the country to the results that will certainly follow the legislation now demanded by the railroad trainmen. If Congress by laws once begins to raise the wages of those in private employment at the request of the employees, it must follow that it will be the duty of Congress to lower wages by law whenever economic necessities require it. When the laboring men ask the Government to raise their wages they concede to the Government the right to reduce their wages. This step once taken ends forever the right of the wage earner to fix his own wages by free and individual contract with his employer. Call it what you please, this bill is in fact compulsory arbitration by the Government of the pending dispute. It is precisely what Mr. Gompers and the leaders of the labor unions throughout the country have at all times and in all places insistently proclaimed should never be done. In the hearing night before last before the Committee on Interstate Commerce, Mr. Gompers said:

> We talk of preparedness, and God knows we are cooperating with all those who are undertaking real preparedness for our country from every enemy, no matter from whence he may come. But we say to you, gentlemen, that if you undertake in the beginning of this movement to take away the rights of the masses of our people and to tie them to their work in principle and fact for any time, you are laying the foundation for future legislation of a compulsory character; the measures of this character, legislation of this character, are the thin entering wedges in the beginning, and they widen and widen and broaden as time goes on. Go the wrong way once and it is almost irretrievable to begin over again and to begin right.

This principle was reiterated by Mr. Garretson, president of the Brotherhood of Railway Conductors, in the following emphatic language:

> Generally speaking, it is a principle of union labor that many questions should not be dealt with legislatively; that it is infinitely better that the settlement of those questions which arise between themselves and their employers should be settled by direct negotiations between the two parties at interest. That this has been with these brotherhoods an intense conviction is demonstrated by the record of the organizations during the years of what might be described as their militancy.

I repeat, Mr. President, when the trainmen consent that Congress as arbitrator shall compel a private employer to raise the wages of a private employee, the labor unions of this country by their representatives are conceding and sustaining compulsory arbitration by Congress as the best and only way to settle disputes between capital and labor. And let it be borne in mind, that when the Government acts as arbitrator its awards will be enforced. It must and will punish as criminals those who by attempting to delay the execution of its decree endanger the public peace and safety. This law once passed, the wage earners of this country will be estopped from ever again asserting the right of labor to collectively bargain with an employer, or, as Mr. Gompers put it, "from the rightful ownership of themselves."

I am and have been for many years in favor of the eight-hour day where the character of the employment will permit it. It is admitted in this controversy that the eight-hour day is impossible owing to the conditions which always surround the railway service. It is admitted that the demand is not for regulation of the hours of service but for a raise of 25 per cent in the compensation.

For the Government to step in and sacrifice a most sacred principle to meet an emergency is, in my opinion, a grave mistake. It is just this sort of thing that in history has always destroyed the civil liberty of the citizen. You may call it paternalism, but it is the key that unlocks the door to socialism, pure and simple. It is admitted that it means the Government ownership of the railroads in the near future. Private capital can not survive Government management. Private capital will be glad to retire and look to the Government for its dividends.

But once the Government owns the means of transportation the means of production will soon follow. Economically speaking, food and clothing and shelter are as useful and necessary to the public as transportation. Politically and morally speaking, it is as much the duty of the Government to regulate the price of food and clothing as it is the price of transportation.

When the Government owns the means of transportation and production, every man will be told by the Government what his work and his wages will be, and if society is to exist at all the man who demurs must be sent to jail. I want the wage earners to realize what this step means. It is a time for them to keep cool and count the cost. The future of this great Nation is in their hands. They can make it a glory or a disgrace. Every laboring man should receive his just share of the fruits of his labor. He has to-day and will have the entire sympathy of the public; and when I say the public I mean his colaborers, which includes 98 per cent of the entire population. The American people will be wise if they insist that their lawmakers continue to legislate for all alike, preferring no class, penalizing no class. They will be wise if they insist that the Executive confine his activities to the execution of the laws, and they will be very wise if they voluntarily submit disputes like the one now pending to the adjudication of impartial tribunals of high character and understanding, rather than cause untold suffering and irreparable loss to their fellow men.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I shall support the House bill because it appears to be the most convenient means by which we may avoid the strike on Monday. It does not meet the true legislative requirements of the people of the United States, as I understand it. It is but a poor temporary expedient. There are many more factors in this controversy deserving consideration and constructive action than the quarrel between the railway employees and the owners of the railway properties. The interest of the general public in this very controversy is far more important than the interest of the railways or of the employees.

Some of our people own the railways, through stocks and bonds, estimated in value at somewhere between nine and twelve billions of dollars. The whole people of this country own properties estimated in value at two hundred and fifty billions, a value twenty or thirty times as great as that of the stocks and bonds of the transportation lines. The employees who are engaged in this controversy are estimated to number 400,000, and, with the people that they may be regarded as rightfully representing, they probably represent from 2 to 5 per cent of the total population of the United States. The people of the United States must depend upon these transportation lines for food and clothing and raw materials and all the things that go to make up the conveniences and the comforts and the necessaries of life.

The question is, Shall 2 per cent or 5 per cent control the 100 per cent, or shall the whole people, in their organized capacity, deal with this question with a masterful hand for the protection of the whole and of all of its parts? I favor dealing with this whole question with firmness, with broad intelligence, and with absolute justice and mercy, always remembering the humane point of view.

The transportation lines are vital in their relation to the general public, and the eight-hour day and the compensation of employees is only one factor which enters into the costs imposed upon the living of the people of the United States. It is only one small factor. There must be considered, besides the question of the compensation of the employees, the amount which is permitted to be charged and paid upon stocks and bonds, and the payment of salaries to employers or their immediate representatives, as well as the rates for transportation services, as all are intimately correlated and interdependent.

We hear a good deal about the amount paid to these employees, who probably earn from three to six or seven dollars a day. We hear nothing about salaries of $100,000 charged on the people of this country by capitalists who employ men at large salaries, who are their friends or their favorites. Why not cut down some of the very big salaries and supplement some of the very small wages? Big service deserves big pay, but big pay ought to go out only for big service. The people quietly pay the freight, and nothing is adequately said or constructively done as to the rights of the public in this matter.

I venture to say that of this so-called value of capital invested in the stocks and bonds of the railways, nearly half is fictitious. The stock is often pure water, and even the bonds which have been issued are often sold to their own creditors at excessive interest rates, and the bonds are sold to those who issue them at 80 cents on the dollar or at a substantial discount. These interest and dividend charges then reappear as a charge on the people of the United States in excessive freight rates and unjust passenger rates when they come to pay for the transportation of freight and passengers. The people of the United States are deeply and profoundly interested in economical methods of administration of these lines, in order that the freight and passenger charges on them may not be excessive.

We have undertaken in a weak and feeble way, through the Interstate Commerce Commission, to regulate these roads; and years ago, after a long struggle of more than a decade, we passed an act authorizing the valuation of these properties, with a view to ascertaining from the valuation of these properties what was a fair freight charge and a fair passenger charge. That work has not been done. It is not being done as it ought to be done. It ought to be done with great speed, in order that the people of the United States may have an immediate basis upon which to determine what these freight rates and passenger rates shall be, or at what price they shall be taken over by the people of the United States, if that policy affords the only adequate remedy for extortion in freight and passenger services.

The public has no adequate information. The freight rates and passenger rates are now fixed merely by the comparison of one line with another line, without any adequate basis of knowledge of either one upon which to determine whether capital is receiving a fair return or not. So I say that this great question of the right of the people of the United States to fair freight rates is profoundly affected by these various conditions, and that this controversy between the railways and their employees is only a part of a tremendous problem which has to be solved in this country; and let no man doubt that the people of the United States have both the constitutional right and the moral right to impose such conditions as shall result in fair freight rates and fair rates for passenger service, whether those conditions are fixing the freight rates or hours of labor and compensation therefor.

I do not wonder that labor is unwilling to agree to arbitration where it believes that the arbiters who will have the final determining word have preconceived notions and fixed prejudices unfavorable to fair compensation to labor. It is equivalent to agreeing to a certain adverse judgment. If there be arbitration, the arbiters must be so safeguarded that there can be no possibility of doubt as to the wisdom and justice of their award or the faithful execution of their award.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LEWIS in the chair). The Chair is compelled to inform the Senator from Oklahoma that he has but one minute left, according to the calculation left to the present occupant of the Chair by his predecessor.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, it is as impossible within 15 minutes to discuss this question in a proper way as it is in 1 minute; and I say, in the 1 minute remaining, that I favor this temporary expedient because it does, at least, abate the immediate evil consequences of a strike and will permit the Congress of the United States to discuss and consider this matter in a broader aspect next winter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the Senator will pardon the Chair, the Senator has more time than has been stated. The calculation left on the memorandum as the Chair observed it is unfair and misleading. The Senator has four minutes of time.

Mr. OWEN. As I say, this will leave to the Congress of the United States an opportunity to consider this matter in its broader aspect. I much prefer to see this matter adjusted on broader lines than those of the present controversy. Here we have an inevitable human conflict. The only means in the world which these men have, as employees, of making effective their protest and bringing to the attention of the people of the United States their complaint is by a concerted strike. The evil consequences of such a course, however, are so gigantic that the heads of these employees trembled at the avalanche they were about to precipitate. They may well fear the anger of the people of the United States, and the railway men may well fear the anger of the people of the United States if this gigantic cataclysm in our commerce and industry should be precipitated by either one or both. I should be in favor of using the full powers of the people of the United States upon both these groups if they dared to bring about such a condition of affairs in this Republic. But they are entitled to a hearing, to fair treatment, and as promptly as humanly possible; but the people pay the bills of both the owners of railroad stocks and bonds, of railroad managers, and of railroad employees, and Congress must settle the whole question on a basis of justice to all, not forgetting the people who at last pay all the bills of capital and labor.

I believe in the eight-hour day. I object to any exception whatever in this bill. I object to excluding any of these short lines or any other lines. Eight hours of labor is enough under modern conditions. Eight hours of labor with modern machinery, with the use of the powers of nature in this country, will be abundant to furnish the people of this country with every comfort, with every convenience, and with every luxury that civilized man requires. I should not like to be compelled to work more than eight hours myself, although as a rule I do work more than eight hours. I have surely worked an average of more than 10 hours my life long, and I have worked for days and weeks and months 14 hours a day; but I have done that because I wished to, but not on compulsion. I would rather be busy than not—except on compulsion. I have worked at the things that entertain me, and I am glad to have had the opportunity. Compulsory hard physical labor driven by necessity is a very different thing——

Mr. LANE. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, we will make a specific exception of him in this bill.

Mr. OWEN. For the man who labors with his hands and labors with his body and performs the severe duties that are imposed upon the workingmen of this country ought not to be required to work over eight hours. An eight-hour day, in my opinion, will be a more efficient day, will be more productive, will be more valuable both to the man who gives it to himself, his employer, and to society, than if the day were prolonged to 10, 12, or 16 hours. This bill will help to promote the eight-hour day not only for the 400,000 members of the railroad brotherhoods but of other railroad employees and in other industrial occupations.

I am glad to see progress made, but I hope the whole question of honest freight and passenger rates will be taken up next Congress with a determined purpose of protecting the people of the United States, invested capital, and labor on a basis of justice to each and all of those concerned in this vital problem.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, as I stated earlier in the day, the question of the establishment of an eight-hour day is not the question involved in this bill at all. There is not a line or a syllable of the bill that attempts to prevent anybody from working more than eight hours a day. That impression may be sought to be conveyed to the country for the purpose of enlisting sympathy for the provisions of this bill. It is utterly unwarranted. The brotherhoods do not claim that it is an eight-hour bill. Everybody admits that it is a bill which will simply add 20 per cent to the wages of the men. The railway operatives would be the first to protest against any legislation by Congress which would prevent their working more than eight hours a day.

Mr. President, this situation which has hung over the country like a pall for the last three or four months or six months, gradually darkening and increasing in its threatening fury as it proceeded, is rapidly drawing to its close. It has drawn the attention of the country, in a way which otherwise might not have been done, to the fact that in the near future some provision must be made by Congress which will be of a general and a permanent character, not only for the purpose of terminating disputes and violence, but for the purpose, so far as may be, of preventing their occurrence and, if they do occur, of having some sort of a peaceful, orderly adjustment of them which will not revert to the era of barbarism, where the man with the biggest club obtained the most of the proceeds of the earth. It is utterly subversive of any theory of a self-governing and a self-respecting country that any set of men or any man should be allowed to assert an arbitrary claim, pronounce judgment in his own suit, and then proceed to execute his own judgment irrespective of the peace and good order of society. No government can stand which permits such a state of facts to exist, and no government ought to stand which permitted such a state of facts to exist.

Mr. President, the question of the regulation of commerce among the States is an exceedingly broad and intricate question. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] has proposed an amendment to this bill which I will ask to have printed in full as a part of my remarks and simply the substance of which I will briefly state here. The effect of it is that the Interstate Commerce Commission shall have the power to fix the hours of labor and determine just and reasonable wages for all employees of the railroads named in section 1 of the act. They are the interstate railroads that are subject to the jurisdiction of the act to regulate commerce.

Mr. UNDERWOOD's amendment in full is as follows:

Add at the end of the bill a new section, as follows:

"SEC. 5. That the Interstate Commerce Commission shall have the power to fix the hours of labor and determine just and reasonable wages for all employees of the railroads named in section 1 of this act. The rate of wages and the hours of labor provided for in this act shall remain fixed for service and pay until changed by the decision of the Interstate Commerce Commission, which, within a period of not less than 6 nor more than 12 months from the passage of this act, shall determine what are just and reasonable wages and what shall be the hours of labor for all employees of the railroads above mentioned.

"The Interstate Commerce Commission shall have the power from time to time to change the hours of labor and the rate of wages for all employees of the railroads named in section 1 of this act, either in whole or in part, upon its own initiative, on the petition of the employees, the managers of the railroads, or the public."

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, that takes up another feature of this great and multiform question to which Congress has given no consideration whatever. Neither branch of Congress has considered it. Such consideration as any individual may have given to it has been of the most casual and fleeting character.

It is asserted by the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] that there is no question about the authority of Congress to confer upon the Interstate Commerce Commission the right to fix wages, because we have conferred upon it the right to fix rates. I have been rather inclined to accept that statement in the past; but as I have thought of it more in detail, I am inclined to think there is considerable question whether that be true.

We must bear in mind that the railroad companies are owned by private stockholders. They are not a part of the Government of the United States. The securities of the railroad companies are property. They are owned by the insurance companies and the savings banks and the great trust funds of this country dedicated to charitable and benevolent uses, and form the basis of every stable fund. Their dividends are not entirely drawn into the pockets of "malefactors of great wealth" or of the presidents or officials of the roads, nor are they so in large part. As I say, they form the basis of all the stable investment and endowment and charitable funds of the country.

When we deal with a railroad question we ought to realize that we are dealing with the investments of a Nation to a large extent and that the visible authorities of the railroad are very frequently least financially concerned in the securities of those companies.

But to return, the fact that we could regulate rates constitutionally or authorize the Interstate Commerce Commission to do it does not necessarily prove to my mind that we can confer upon a commission the right to regulate wages, because the rate charged by the common carrier railroad corporations was a rate charged to the public for carrying the goods of the public. It was the legitimate regulation of commerce as everybody agrees. The fixing of the price which the private owner of a railroad shall pay to the private parties whom he employs may possibly be construed by the court to be a matter between master and servant not sufficiently connected with and related to commerce among the States to bring it within the regulatory power of Congress.

But, it is said, inasmuch as we have regulated the hours during which certain railway employees may work upon trains we may therefore regulate their wages. Mr. President, we regulated the hours because that was necessary for the safety of interstate transportation. To what extent a court will go in saying that the regulation of the wages is necessary for the safety of interstate transportation remains to be seen; it is an entirely unadjudicated question.

Whether that is perfectly plain or not, it is perfectly evident that the amendment of the Senator from Alabama conferring this great power as to wages and hours upon the Interstate Commerce Commission should not be put upon a bill with this limited consideration. It is open to exactly the same objections that the bill itself is open to, for nobody understands or pretends to understand the relations of the exceedingly intricate subjects with which the bill proceeds offhand to deal.

Mr. President, I wish to state another reason why I could not give my vote for this amendment or for the bill. Congress has passed a resolution, known as joint resolution No. 60, by which a commission, composed of the members of the Committee on Interstate Commerce of the Senate and the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce of the House, is instructed to proceed to the consideration and investigation of the subject of the Government control and regulation of interstate and foreign transportation, the efficiency of the existing system in protecting the rights of shippers and carriers and in promoting the public interest, the incorporation or control of the incorporation of carriers, and all proposed changes in the organization of the Interstate Commerce Commission and the act to regulate commerce, also the subject of the Government ownership of all public utilities such as telegraphs, wireless, cables, telephone, and so forth. I ask that the joint resolution may be incorporated as a part of my remarks.

Mr. FLETCHER. What is the date of it, may I ask the Senator?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. It is known as Senate joint resolution No. 60, passed by the Sixty-fourth Congress, and approved July 20, 1916.

The joint resolution referred to is as follows:

[Public resolution No. 25, 64th Cong.]

Joint resolution (S. J. Res. 60) creating a joint subcommittee from the membership of the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce and the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce to investigate the conditions relating to interstate and foreign commerce, and the necessity of further legislation relating thereto, and defining the powers and duties of such subcommittee.

Resolved, etc., That the Interstate Commerce Committee of the Senate and the Committee of the House of Representatives on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, through a joint subcommittee to consist of five Senators and five Representatives, who shall be selected by said committees, respectively, be, and they hereby are, appointed to investigate the subject of the Government control and regulation of interstate and foreign transportation, the efficiency of the existing system in protecting the rights of shippers and carriers and in promoting the public interest, the incorporation or control of the incorporation of carriers, and all proposed changes in the organization of the Interstate Commerce Commission and the act to regulate commerce, also the subject of Government ownership of all public utilities, such as telegraph, wireless, cable, telephone, express companies, and railroads engaged in interstate and foreign commerce and report as to the wisdom or feasibility of Government ownership of such utilities and as to the comparative worth and efficiency of Government regulation and control as compared with Government ownership and operation, with authority to sit during the recess of Congress and with power to summon witnesses, to administer oaths, and to require the various departments, commissions, and other Government agencies of the United States to furnish such information and render such assistance as may, in the judgment of the joint subcommittee, be deemed desirable, to appoint necessary experts, clerks, and stenographers, and to do whatever is necessary for a full and comprehensive examination and study of the subject and report to Congress on or before the second Monday in January, 1917; that the sum of $24,000, or so much thereof as is necessary to carry out the purposes of this resolution and to pay the necessary expenses of the subcommittee and its members is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated. Said appropriation shall be immediately available and shall be paid out on the audit and order of the chairman or acting chairman of said subcommittee, which audit and order shall be conclusive and binding upon all departments as to the correctness of the accounts of such subcommittee.

Approved July 20, 1916.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. That commission has been appointed; it is in existence, and has appointed a subcommittee to carry out its program of investigation; and it is ordered to report to Congress on the reconvening of Congress. The amendment of the Senator from Alabama, if adopted, would be a permanent policy in the Government. Surely we can not enter upon that in this light and frivolous way.

Mr. President, this particular situation ought not to be dealt with by a permanent and general law. The provision of the bill constituting eight hours as a basic day in determining the compensation of men goes on forever. To be sure it is only a tub to the whale in the way of a remedy, because, although the compensation of the employees can not be reduced under the terms of the bill for the next 10 or 11 months, as soon as that has expired the employees and the employers are relegated again to their private contracts and their arrangements for compensation, and if the railroads, as the experience of the operation of this measure, say that it is so expensive—they claim $60,000,000 a year is the additional cost because of its operation—they can not pay that rate of wage, although they can not change the eight-hour basis, and they simply say, "We can not pay so much per hour," the same situation arises. The men protest and the railroads protest. It may be that the railroads would propose to arbitrate, and as the representatives of the trainmen stated in the hearing, it is their policy to refuse arbitration; they have tried it and it has failed. Then we are up against the very same situation six months hence.

This controversy is not one to be temporized or played with. It is sufficiently plain to the Congress that, whether the strike comes or not, the first duty of this Nation upon the reconvening of Congress is to take up this great problem and consider it in all its phases, because, as I say, we want to be just to labor, we want to be just to capital, and we must preserve the great transportation of this country free and uninterrupted; and whether the remedy be by the creation of a special tribunal, so constituted as that the laboring men and the general public can have confidence in it and compel the submission of contests of this kind to such a tribunal and compel the abiding of its judgment, we are forever engaged in an industrial war that may paralyze the resources of the Nation.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. President, I have just returned from a trip of more than 3,000 miles, coming direct to the Senate Chamber from the station, and believe I am in a position to briefly state the feelings of the people generally with regard to the pending bill before us this morning, House bill 17700, "for the establishment of an eight-hour day for the employees of carriers engaged in interstate and foreign commerce."

I do not know what line of discussion upon this subject has been advanced by Members of the Senate at yesterday's lengthy session, and hence I may touch upon the same thoughts in my remarks that have already been given you for consideration.

Personally I consider the passage of this bill to be the most important matter of real benefit to the people that has come before this body during this session. The failure to pass this or some similar measure before next Monday morning will probably plunge this country into the greatest commercial calamity that has ever befallen it, and for that reason I feel that no time should be lost.

I understand President Wilson has urged us to enact some legislation of this kind which will give immediate relief to the people upon a question that must be met at once. He has not asked this legislation for himself, but has asked it for the benefit of 100,000,000 people of this great Republic, and they will indorse his demand and the action of this body in enacting this bill into law.

The question has been raised by newspapers regarding the constitutionality of this measure now before the Senate. That is a question, as it appears to me, which is not an issue at this time. It is a question that must be left entirely to the courts. We may not be able to pass a bill that will meet the requirements of the whole country, because we have not the time; but we must, if we do our duty, enact some law that will at least give us temporary relief from the great danger that confronts us as a people.

Mr. President, it is a big question, and it should be handled in a big way, and I believe this body is competent to do it and will do it at once.

The question of travel and inconvenience to the public is the smallest possible question that we should consider in relation to this subject. Should a strike come upon the country, it will paralyze every industry; it will stop all manufacturing; it will stop mining; it will stop the mills, and it will put an end, at least for the time being, to all commerce; and it will do more than this, it will be followed by want, by distress, by riots and bloodshed.

Poverty and death will exist where we now have prosperity and contentment in the land. Every person in the United States is equally interested—every man, every woman, and every child—because it is something which will affect all alike should it come about.

Certainly we all know what suffering, misery, and distress follow strikes of this kind, and we can not help but feel that it is our sacred duty, as Members of this body, to endeavor to prevent in every possible way such conditions being forced upon the country at this time.

I do not know—I am not in a position to know—whether the demands of the labor leaders are just on this question or whether the contentions of the railroads are right; but I do know that there is a third party, the great common people of the United States, and I do know that they should be protected now and at all times and that their needs should be looked after, regardless of the question of right or wrong as concerns the demands of the railroads or their employees. Each have their own needs to look after and we have our duty to perform.

I have observed in the press that some of these labor leaders fear that if this bill should be passed and they should recall their orders for the strike next Monday they will be criticized and possibly branded as traitors to the cause which they represent.

I do not believe that, because they are representing the people for whom they are responsible in the same way that we are representing the people of the entire country. I think that the men they represent are confident that they will work for their best interests, just as I hope the people of the United States may have confidence in us and believe that we will do our duty.

I have the honor to have been a lifetime friend of one of these labor leaders. I have known him since we were children together. I have never known him other than an honest, capable, and fearless man, who would never forsake a cause or betray a trust. That man is Mr. A. B. Garretson, of Cedar Rapids, Iowa.

Mr. President, we do not represent our individual ideas in this matter. We can not vote, perhaps, as we would like to vote if we only considered our own views; but we are representing our constituency; we are representing all the people of the United States. Our constituency demands of us and the people in general demand of us that we consider in a businesslike way the great and grave problem that now confronts the country, and when we pass this bill to-day we will lift the pall that has been hanging over the country like a dark cloud for the past few days.

Mr. President, I have no intention in these few remarks to defend the labor unions in their contentions in this particular demand, because, as I have before stated, I am not in a position to know whether it is just or not. I am a friend of labor when labor is right, but I believe that its friends may at times be unjust in their demands. None of us is free from mistakes and abuse of power. Neither do I undertake, in my feeble way, to uphold the railroads, for the reasons before set out, but my observations have been that they have at all times been able to get three meals a day and a resting place at night from their profits from the people, and I have no fear that they will not be able to do so in the future.

Mr. President, I am unable to understand the position of the Republican Members of this body. I am unable to understand how they will be able to go before the country with a record of having resisted the enactment of this necessarily important bill into law, which will relieve, for the present at least, every citizen of our great country from a condition that would be appalling were it brought about. I can only believe that the position assumed by the minority has been taken for political reasons, antagonistic to the Democratic Party, because this bill will be recognized as a Democratic measure. Certainly they can not have the interests of the people of the country at heart in taking such a course, and I regret more than I can express that such a condition should exist in this splendid body. Surely, if this is not true, they prefer stagnation and want to reign within the country, where now dwells peace and plenty.

I thought, Mr. President, that the day of political secrets had passed, and yet what puzzles me is the attitude of the minority. What explanation will its Members give their constituents for their opposition to this bill? What are they going to say to the manufacturers and producers of all that keeps the great pulse of our commerce in motion? What reason are they going to give the farmers and stock raisers of the great Northwest and the cotton growers of the South, all of whom depend upon the transportation systems of the country to furnish markets for their produce?

It will not be easy for them to make these explanations. These manufacturers and farmers know better than anyone else the vast amount of money they will lose should this bill fail to pass by next Monday morning, when the wheels of all the railways in the United States stop turning.

Fellow Senators, the price of grain, of cattle and horses, of sheep and hogs, and the commodities of all producers and farmers would decline so rapidly and so suddenly that they could not realize 50 cents on the dollar for what these same commodities bring in to-day's open market.

Failure and bankruptcy would fall to the lot of men who are now prosperous and contented, who are making a good living for themselves and families, and who are, perhaps, laying up a little money for old age. They know these things will come about just as well as any Senator who sits here to-day, and you can not fool them by excuses. You can not tell them there will be no strike, because they will not believe it, and you yourselves do not believe it. You will probably tell them that freight rates may increase slightly for a short time; but that will not satisfy them, because they know that where they would lose cents in increased freight rates, should they be imposed they would lose dollars in the decline of prices, should this threatened strike occur, by our failure to pass this bill before the time set for the calling of it.

No, my Republican friends, you have got yourselves in a hole by your own acts, and you can never get out and look the same again. Next November you will be left holding the sack, asking one another "Why?"

It seems to me that the criticism of our great President in asking Congress to enact this law is one which will not have any weight with the people. He has been criticized in this matter by the press, by Members of the Senate, and by politicians everywhere; the same as he has been criticized for his Mexican policy, for the child-labor law, and for many other matters of great and vital interest to this Republic. I believe the President has done his duty as he sees it, and I believe he has done his duty well in connection with all these great absorbing questions. I also believe that the people know it; and knowing it, they approve the stand taken by the President on each of these matters, and I feel that these criticisms to which he has been subjected will have no weight with them, but they will only tend to discredit those who indulge in them, and to condemn the Republican Party for all time to come.

Mr. President, in my observations through life, one of the things that I have always noticed is, that when any measure of real benefit to the people is asked for in Congress or in State legislatures, those opposing such legislation always raise the question of the constitutionality of the law proposed. If we should stop to consider and determine, at all times, whether a law is constitutional or not, I fear that we would not pass many laws that would be of real benefit to the people, and for that reason I am willing to go on record as a supporter of this bill and leave the question of its constitutionality to the proper tribunals—the courts of the country—to determine afterwards, because this question demands immediate action.

The great cry of the people of the country coming to President Wilson from thousands, and hundreds of thousands in the past few weeks and months has been: "Mr. President, keep us out of war; keep us from this impending strike." He has withstood the severe strain of these responsibilities, which are greater by far than any President since the days of Lincoln has been called upon to shoulder, with sublime courage and fortitude, bearing the burdens of the people in his splendid effort to keep the Republic from being undermined by the selfish demands of those who represent personal interests. I thank God that he has so far succeeded. I believe that, with the help of Congress, he will to-day be master of the situation in this country in these trying hours now confronting us.

Our duty as men is so plain that it can not be misunderstood, and we will do that duty.

Mr. President, I believe that at the next session of Congress we should go farther—much farther than this bill provides—as we do not have the time to do it now. I believe Congress should enact and place on the statute books a law which will make it impossible for any labor union, or for any set or class of men, to bring a great crisis upon the United States, which would affect every man, woman, and child living therein; and when that question is raised at the coming short session of Congress in December, I, for one, will vote for it.

If it becomes necessary for us to change the Constitution to enact such a law, then let us change it; and if it becomes necessary for this Government to acquire supervision of the railroads of the United States for the protection of its commerce and its people, I will vote for that also. I will vote for any measure that will prevent the recurrence in the future of anything of the kind which now confronts us. The great administration of President Wilson can not be criticized with any degree of justice. No man can help but point with pride to the splendid accomplishments of the Democratic Party during the present administration. No political party in the history of the country ever accomplished half so much in the same time.

Consider, if you will, a few of the great laws that have been enacted since Woodrow Wilson was inaugurated President. There is the income-tax law, which has come to stay; during this administration an amendment to the Federal Constitution providing for the election of Senators by a direct vote of the people was ratified by three-fourths of the States and proclaimed as the seventeenth amendment by a Democratic Secretary of State; a Federal Trade Commission law, with power to weed out corrupt business and encourage, help, and strengthen good business, was passed; the wholesome and useful piece of legislation known as the Clayton antitrust law, which carries a provision for checking and controlling monopoly in various forms, was enacted during this administration.

A good-roads law was passed at this session. I admit this question had been agitated in previous Republican administrations, but it remained for a Democratic Congress to write this law on the statute books, which is of untold benefit to every resident of every State in the Union. A child-labor law was enacted and approved by the President only last Friday. I do not wish to overlook the preparedness legislation, which passed at this session and which has already received the signature of President Wilson by which our Army and Navy has been materially strengthened in every branch of the service.

The ship-purchase bill should also be included in the big achievements of this administration. It has passed both Houses, and, as I am informed, only awaits the signature of the President to become a law. When this is done and this measure goes into effect, the outrageous ocean-freight rates now charged in this country will be greatly reduced. I would not be just to myself or this administration were I to omit the rural-credits law from this list, in which provision is made whereby the farmers of the United States can secure loans on their farms at longer time and more reasonable rates than heretofore. This law will be in complete operation as soon as the proper machinery can be set in motion.

Mr. President, I realize that I have digressed somewhat from the subject under consideration. In conclusion, permit me to say that I do not know whether this eight-hour law will be of real benefit to these workingmen or not. I am not in a position to determine. If it satisfies them at this time, and if it is a means of preventing the pending great strike, then, I say, let them be the judge. There is a serious question in my mind as to whether or not this proposed legislation will be of any benefit to them in the end; but, as one Member of the Senate, I am willing to leave the determination of this question entirely with their organizations.

It must be apparent to each Senator that there is something fundamentally wrong with the laws of a country which will permit strikes of the magnitude threatened to occur; and if that is true each of us should be interested in trying to relieve the situation.

All of us some time in life have felt the heartbeats of those in sorrow, in poverty or want; and each of us, I trust, in his feeble way has endeavored to relieve those in distress. What we are doing to-day in our endeavor to pass this law is to prevent in a wholesale way the recurrence of this very thing in every section of the country.

I hope and believe that this bill will become a law, and I hope and believe that it will not only become a law but that its enactment will prevent the greatest calamity to the American people, as I look at it, which has ever threatened us during our lifetime.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I rise now principally to explain an amendment which I expect in due time to offer in the way of a substitute for this bill, because, under the parliamentary situation and the unanimous consent agreement under which the Senate is now operating, I shall not have time to make any explantion when it is offered.

Mr. President, I do not desire to underestimate the condition that is presented to the country and which we are trying to avoid by legislation. I realize with all other American citizens that we ought to obviate the present difficulty if we can do so honorably. The pending measure does not, in my judgment, meet the situation. To a very great extent it is temporary. The provision in regard to the recognition of the eight-hour day, or rather that part of the bill which provides how the roads shall be operated as far as the eight-hour day is concerned, will not even temporarily in my judgment bring any relief.

Section 3 of the bill provides:

That pending the report of the commission herein provided for and for a period of 30 days thereafter the compensation of railway employees subject to this act for a standard eight-hour workday shall not be reduced below the present standard day's wage, and for all necessary time in excess of eight hours such employees shall be paid at a rate not less than the pro rata rate for such standard eight-hour workday.

Mr. President, if we provide that eight hours shall be the workday and then provide that you can work as much over eight hours as you and your employer may agree upon, and that for the overtime you will not be paid an excess you will have virtually accomplished nothing as far as an eight-hour day is concerned.

If we want to make an eight-hour day effective we must in some way penalize the overtime by the increase of pay or some other method so that it would not be profitable for the railroad companies to undertake to work the men more than eight hours.

Mr. President, I believe in the establishment of an eight-hour day. I should like to extend it as far as possible, and we are well justified in having it apply to men who are engaged in the management of interstate trains.

Complaint is made that others are justly entitled to the same consideration. Without denying that, it seems to me that it is sufficient to say that in regard to the men who are operating the interstate trains Congress has jurisdiction. Even though it may have jurisdiction of others there is a particular reason why men operating trains should not be overworked that does not apply to all other branches of industry. I will not have time to go into that, but I think that is apparent to everybody. The general public has a right to demand that every man who has anything to do with the control of an interstate train shall be in full possession of all his mental faculties. He can not have this if he is overworked.

I am going to offer a substitute for the bill when the time arrives, when it will be in order, which will provide for a recognition of the eight-hour day, and which in addition to that will provide that the Interstate Commerce Commission shall be empowered to fix the wages of all the men named in section 1 of the act, and also fix the salaries of all the officials of all the interstate railroads, and fix by rules and regulations the conditions under which men will be allowed to work over eight hours and the rates that they shall receive for such overtime, and then provide that the men, the employees or the officers, at any time feeling aggrieved at the salary or wage received shall have the right either individually or collectively through organizations to apply to the Interstate Commerce Commission for an increase, and that the same rules as to the Interstate Commerce Commission that apply in cases of complaint made by shippers shall apply and operate in such a case. I propose to provide that any citizen or organization of citizens can complain in regard to the wages or the salary of the officials.

It seems to me that sometimes we forget that in this great controversy there are three parties—the men, the railroads, and the public. We are too apt to forget that the public have rights that are at least equal to the rights of any other interested parties.

Personally, I can not see why some great tribunal representing the great public, if we are going to regulate the railroads at all, should not have sufficient authority to make a complete regulation. The salaries that the presidents of the roads get and the wages that the brakemen receive are both included in the freight rate and the passenger rate that the great public must pay. It is assumed that we have the right to control rates. That is admitted now by everybody, although it formerly was contested, and we have given to the Interstate Commerce Commission the right to regulate rates, to fix rates, to initiate complaints, and to pass on complaints made by individual shippers or anyone representing the public. We have given them the right to investigate and provided the means by which they can send out and get the evidence and make a thorough investigation with the object in the end of fixing a rate that is fair to the railroads and fair to the shipping public and to the consuming public. There is no member of the great public who is not interested in these rates.

It is important in fixing a rate that we know the value of the property and the money invested, and so on; but it is no more important than that we be able to regulate the money that shall be paid to all the employees of the company and the salary that shall be received by all the officials of the company. In other words, if the Interstate Commerce Commission had no authority—and it has not under the present law—to include these items, the salaries of the officials and the wages of the employees, an agreement between the railroad employees and the officials could so increase wages and salaries that it would be necessary that rates should be increased, and additional burdens unnecessarily put upon the people who have to pay those rates.

Why, Mr. President, I understand now a good many of the presidents and other officials of the railroad companies get salaries that to me seem exorbitant and unreasonable. I do not believe that there is a railroad president in the United States who is earning $100,000 a year, but I understand some of them get even more than that. I do not believe there is a railroad man or any other man engaged in any business in the United States whose services are so valuable as that; and yet there is not now any way, under the law as it stands to-day, to cut those salaries down. There is not any tribunal that can pass on that question.

It is suggested here that we give the Interstate Commerce Commission the right to pass on the trainmen's wages and the conductors' wages, while the man who gets $100,000—who is, perhaps, the very man who is objecting to the increase of the wages of the employees—has a salary that at least ought to be submitted to some fair tribunal for the purpose of ascertaining whether or not it is too great. They are all on an equality; they all constitute a part of the rates that must be charged for freight and passenger service. The same tribunal which investigates the one ought to be empowered to investigate the other.

The bill we have here provides for the appointment of a commission, and if the amendment of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] is agreed to, as I hope it will be, the bill will then provide for a commission to investigate the wages and the eight-hour-day system. Then the commission—a different body—will have the power to fix wages, but there is no idea, so far as this bill is concerned, of their making any investigation in order to fix them.

There will be one commission investigating, without any power to fix anything, while the commission which would have the power to fix and to regulate is not making any investigation. It seems to me that it is unnecessary for us to provide for a commission, at an enormous expenditure of public money, to make an investigation if we give the Interstate Commerce Commission the authority and the power to fix salaries and wages. If it is necessary for them to make an investigation in order to fix wages, they are the ones to whom we should give the power. They have the authority to make an investigation. Perhaps giving them the right to fix the wages would give them the authority to make the investigation. I am inclined to think it would.

Then, what is the use of this other commission, traveling over the country at enormous expense, with perhaps thousands of employees? Although you have provided a limitation when the term of the commission must expire, we know how such things go. They will not be through with their work, perhaps, and, the first thing we know, we shall have a permanent commission investigating without any authority to act.

Mr. President, when they get through investigating, or 30 days afterwards, then at least a portion of this law becomes inoperative. No provision is made to rectify the condition that presents itself to us now, and which will again present itself to us then. If we should adopt the substitute which I have outlined it would, in my judgment, bring permanent relief. We would thereby recognize by law—and that is one of the functions of Congress, it seems to me—the eight-hour workday, as to trainmen, and we would give to the Interstate Commerce Commission the power to pass on all of the intricacies that must necessarily surround the settling of the amount of wages the men engaged in railroad service shall receive. This would provide a court to which they can go and have the compulsory service of witnesses; where the evidence can be preserved and taken care of by this permanent board provided by law for the regulation of railroad rates.

Mr. President, I am firmly of the belief that one tribunal ought to have complete control to regulate the rates, including the fixing of wages and salaries. It has been said by one Senator that that means Government ownership of railroads. It has been said just as earnestly by another able Senator that to permit the commission to fix the wages is the only thing that will prevent Government ownership. So far as I am concerned, Mr. President, and so far as this question is concerned, I do not care whether or not it leads toward Government ownership or whether it leads in the other direction. The question is, Is it illogical, is it right, and is it fair? When we pass a law that is fair and that is just, we ought to be willing to follow the results wherever they may lead.

I know that there is some feeling among the railroad men, which is shared in by others, and in which I admit I share, of a prejudice against the Interstate Commerce Commission as it now exists, which has arisen by reason of some of the things which happened in the recent past, notably the second hearing on what is called the 5 per cent rate increase; but we ought to either abolish the commission or give it complete authority of regulation. It is the logical tribunal to pass on this question. I would rather give to that body the complete power of regulation—and regulation can not be successful unless that power is complete—even though for the time being I might have some prejudice against the court.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. May the Chair say to the able Senator from New Hampshire that he is under somewhat of an obligation to recognize the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON], if he desires to occupy this time? Otherwise, the Chair will recognize the Senator fom New Hampshire.

Mr. KENYON. I defer to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator from Iowa made an arrangement with me that I should now proceed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire is recognized by the Chair.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I hold in my hand the crop of telegrams which have come to me during the last 24 hours, numbering at least 100. Many of the telegrams are from great industrial establishments from all parts of the country, protesting against the passage of this proposed law, while some are from labor unions asking that it shall be passed. I hold in my hand a bunch of telegrams from the city of Berlin, N. H., an industrial city, but shall read only one of them, which is as follows:

BERLIN, N. H., August 31, 1916.

HON. JACOB GALLINGER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Members of Bartenders' Union, Local 677, insist upon the eight-hour workday for railroad trainmen at the present compensation, and emphatically protest against any law imposing involuntary servitude even for a day.

DANIEL FRAZIER, President.

Mr. President, I confess I do not comprehend what these men mean by "involuntary servitude," unless they allude to arbitration. However that may be, I want to suggest that if these bartenders would only inquire and ascertain how much "involuntary servitude" they have imposed upon the men, women, and children of their communities they might perhaps with more grace come to the Senate of the United States with a petition of this kind.

Mr. President, when the Congress of the United States exempted by law the membership of the labor unions of the country from the provisions of a criminal statute—the Sherman anti-trust law—I almost despaired of conservative action on the part of the Congress on the great economic questions of the day. Congress surrendered then to an unusual demand, and now we are asked to surrender to the power of force, accompanied by threats to paralyze the transportation and commerce of the country.

Mr. President, as the Congress yielded to the demands to make it unlawful for me (or you) to do certain acts and not unlawful for members of labor unions to do the same thing, so now the Congress is asked to yield to a demand for increased wages for highly paid men under the guise of an eight-hour day, which they themselves frankly admit they do not ask or want.

Mr. President, this propaganda on the part of the four brotherhoods has been condemned by almost every commercial body and by almost every leading newspaper of the country. I have extracts on my desk from many such newspapers, but in the 15 minutes allotted to me have not time to read them, but will call attention to a recent utterance from the Chicago Daily News. That widely circulated and leading newspaper, under the caption of "Legislation by strike threats," discusses this subject so frankly that I commend it to the attention of Senators. For want of time to read it, I ask, Mr. President, that the extract from that newspaper be printed as a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There being no objection, it is so ordered.

The extract referred to is as follows:

Americans should cherish no illusions in regard to the nature of the proceedings that are now under way in the national Congress. That body, acting at the urgent request of the President, is considering the proposed enactment of legislation for the special purpose of inducing the leaders of the railroad brotherhoods to rescind their strike order issued to go into effect at 7 o'clock next Monday morning. The supporters of the President's program know the price that the brotherhood leaders intend to exact, and they are planning to legislate under duress and a time limit in order to pay the price. Questions of reason and justice do not enter into the matter.

One of the three bills that have been submitted to Congress on the initiative of the President—the bill establishing a basic eight-hour day for railroad employees engaged in interstate commerce—embraces the minimum demand of the brotherhood leaders. Enactment of that bill is declared by them to be the price of peace—that is to say, temporary peace, for they make no promises except as to the immediate future. The passage of the eight-hour bill in both Houses by midnight to-morrow, the brotherhood leaders say, will secure the recall of their strike order. Meanwhile they take a bored interest in the President's bill dealing with mediation, arbitration, and investigation of labor disputes, and the President's other measure giving the national Government authority to operate the railroads in case of military necessity. They and their sympathizers in and out of Congress do not want either of the latter bills to pass as drafted. * * *

There is in short, good reason to suspect that of the President's three bills one is for passage and the other two are for show. The brotherhoods, with the able assistance of the President of the United States, have set out to secure an eight-hour basic day for all their members. If they get what they are seeking the brotherhood leaders, Mr. Gompers and the rest, will promptly turn their guns on the remaining measures. Thereupon Congress, no longer responding to the President's prod, is likely to discover with startling suddenness that after all it is in no hurry permanently to protect the public from strikes and strike violence. In that case the beauties of careful investigation and statesmanly deliberation will receive belated recognition at the Capitol, Congress will make a plausible gesture and hasten to adjourn.

The basic eight-hour day for railroad workers is to be legislated into existence at this time, if at all, practically by the railroad brotherhoods themselves through the persuasive powers of their threats of force, confusion, and widespread property loss. Can the 100,000,000 people of this Nation afford to suffer this extraordinary outrage in order to purchase a craven peace? A peace so purchased, a peace of this contemptible quality, must necessarily be temporary, fear-ridden, futile.

The American people should demand at this crisis that Congress refuse to pass laws under duress, working breathlessly against time because it has been stampeded by threats and political nightmares. The attempt of the four railroad brotherhoods to hold a stop-watch on Congress and the Nation should meet the rebuke that its audacious impertinence demands.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, it is a matter of regret to me that this controversy, which ought to be settled by arbitration, is before this body. This legislation is to benefit 350,000, more or less, of highly paid railroad employees. If this demand is yielded, what about the other great army of poorly paid railroad workers, between one and two millions in number? I read in a well-known publication on yesterday a statement to the effect that a gentleman, recently returning from a trip in the Blue Ridge Mountains, says he was waiting at a small station on the Southern Railway for a train to Washington, two and one-half hours late by reason of floods in North and South Carolina. He got into conversation with the baggage-master, who informed him that a member of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers had stigmatized the agitation for a shorter day as iniquitous.

Why—

Said the engineer to his friend, the baggageman—

I am getting twice as much as I ever expected to earn. I receive $9.30 a day every day in the year. When I arrived at $5 a day I thought I was well paid and was perfectly satisfied. It is general opinion of many honest engineers and firemen that they are fully paid and in some cases overpaid.

The baggageman then said:

I have been with the Southern doing this work nearly 16 years, and all I get is $1.30 a day.

Pointing to a laborer on the track in front of the station, he said:

There is a man who has been with the Southern 27 years, and he is making only $1.15 a day, and can not get any more. He has a wife and family to keep, and travels 4 miles from his shanty to his work here every morning and back at night.

All of which goes to show—

Said the returned traveler—

that organized union men are so well paid that there is not sufficient left in railroad earnings to properly compensate those who do not belong to the powerful labor unions. If labor unions go much further, the public may be awakened and realize that unions may be likened to "Vaulting ambition, which o'erleaps itself and falls on the other side."

Mr. President, if that is a correct statement, as I believe it to be, it should give pause to this body as to its duty in the matter before it.

Let me ask in all seriousness, How long will this army of poorly paid railroad employees remain quiescent if this bill becomes a law? Will not they also strike? If not, why not? Think it over, Senators, and seriously ask yourselves if the proposed legislation will remedy the difficulty that confronts the country.

Among the telegrams that have come to me to-day, Mr. President, is one from New York, which I am going to read. It is as follows:

NEW YORK, September 1, 1916.

Hon Senator JACOB H. GALLINGER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Increasing trainmen's wages arbitrarily 20 per cent is deliberate injustice. Any railway income available for increased wages should be devoted to other employees now notoriously underpaid. Public sympathy, usually with strikers, is now almost unanimously against trainmen, who would outrage the public for purely selfish ends. Railways are necessary public highways, and the people are entitled to first consideration. Advise arbitration or fight.

HARRY G. TARVER,
Society of Constructive Defense.

Mr. President, I am in favor of arbitration, and I exceedingly regret that this controversy is not to be settled through that instrumentality; but it is said that arbitration shall not under any circumstances be allowed in this contest. The representatives of the four brotherhoods have repudiated arbitration. This gentleman, telegraphing me, who signs himself as a member of the "Society of Constructive Defense," advises that if we can not get arbitration we should fight.

Well, Mr. President, the fiat has gone forth, and the probabilities are that no effort that we may make here against this bill will be successful. It will pass because it has the indorsement and the active support of the President of the United States, who seems to have taken charge of the legislative department of the Government.

It has also, apparently, the indorsement of the Democratic majority of this body; and for the reasons I have cited all we can do is to protest; and that is what I want to do before the bill comes to a vote.

I have listened with a good deal of interest to Senators who have told us that this legislation came from the President of the United States. It reminds me of a circumstance which occurred several years ago when the late lamented and distinguished Senator from Georgia, Mr. Bacon, in this body told of an incident which he witnessed in a foreign country. He did not state which country it was, but we all understood it was the neighboring Republic of Mexico. He said he went into the legislative assembly of that country and was startled to discover the fact that when bills were offered they were not debated or considered in any way but were passed without a word either in favor of or in opposition to the measures. He inquired of a distinguished gentleman what that all meant, and received the reply, "Why, Senator, those bills come from the President, and we do not need to discuss them!" We seem to be in pretty much the same attitude in this country that they were in Mexico when the late Senator Bacon visited the assembly of that Republic.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, will the Senator pardon an interruption?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. GALLINGER. With pleasure.

Mr. CLAPP. I understand that in Mexico, before the revolution at any rate, no bill could be introduced until it had actually run the gantlet of a committee, and its introduction had been authorized by the committee.

Mr. GALLINGER. Well, Mr. President, that may be so. I simply quoted from a former very distinguished Member of this body to show that the bills were not debated. If they came from the President of that Republic, doubtless the committee that considered them was under instructions.

Mr. President, I ask again, if we pass this legislation, how long will this army of poorly paid railway employees remain quiescent? Will not they also strike; and if not, why not? And again, if the railroad employees can force legislation of this kind, what about the many other millions of workingmen engaged in various employments the country over? What about the men who work in the mines, in the factories, and on the farms? What are they going to say when they are told that the representatives of certain labor unions came to the Congress of the United States, demanding that their claims should be recognized by the Congress in the face of a threatened strike that would paralyze the transportation interests and the commercial interests of this great Republic? Are they going to remain silent under those circumstances? Are they not going to see their power, Mr. President, as they have never seen it before, and are we not then going to face a condition of things more serious than we face to-day or than we have faced at any time in the history of this country?

Up to this time this army of men engaged in industrial pursuits the country over have supposed that arbitration was a recognized policy of the Government; but now the men who threaten this disastrous strike openly repudiate arbitration. When I asked some of them why they did not submit this question to arbitration, they said that they would never consent to have a controversy of this kind settled in that way; and they further intimated that unless the railroads yielded, they would insist upon the recognition of their demands by the Government through legislation, or else they would force this disastrous strike upon the people of the country.

Mr. President, I deprecate the possibility of a strike by these men, but I can not bring myself to believe that they would do so cruel and indefensible a thing under any circumstances. Perhaps they would, but, if they did, on their heads would rest the responsibility—an awful and a terrible responsibility.

Mr. President, I do not believe the position that members of these organizations occupy to-day is well understood. We are told that these four brotherhoods represent 350,000 or 400,000 men; that they have had a referendum; that those men have voted for a strike; and that a strike must necessarily follow unless this matter is settled by either a yielding of the railroad managers or by legislation on the part of Congress. A newspaper published an hour ago, the Washington Times, contains a dispatch from Chicago, headed "Western railroad men refuse to strike. Protests against walkout pour in from thousands of brotherhood members." Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the article shall be read by the Secretary.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hearing no objection, it will be so ordered.

The Secretary read the article, as follows:

WESTERN RAILROAD MEN REFUSE TO STRIKE—PROTESTS AGAINST WALKOUT POUR IN FROM THOUSANDS OF BROTHERHOOD MEMBERS.

CHICAGO, Ill., September 2, 1916.

Throughout the West and Southwest there exists a very evident disinclination to obey the order of the four brotherhoods to strike at 7 a. m. Monday.

Engineers, conductors, and employees of every class affected by the order have not only declared their intention to disobey the order, but have, in some cases, sent protests to the four chiefs in Washington against its enforcement.

There is very good ground for believing that in the event of the order going into effect, owing to any hitch at Washington or elsewhere, not more than 25 per cent of the whole of the employees would join the walkout.

Vice President Byram, of the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy, stated that the poll of engineers, firemen, and trainmen, including conductors, show that 25 per cent of the members of the brotherhoods employed by the roads will not obey a strike order.

THOUSANDS REFUSE.

One thousand conductors employed on the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railroad have telegraphed A. B. Garretson, general chairman of the Order of Railway Conductors, that they have withdrawn from the strike movement, E. D. Sewall, vice president of the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul road announced.

A delegation of conductors of the Chicago & North Western Railroad has left here for Washington to oppose a strike. At headquarters of the General Managers' Association it was said that the men hoped to be in time to espouse the cause of the railroads before Congress.

Members of the four brotherhoods employed on the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Railroad have requested their union chiefs to withdraw the order to strike.

The chairman of the Order of Railway Conductors refused to issue the strike order on the Santa Fe lines in California.

The Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railroad was notified that the Brotherhood of Railway Conductors on the section of that system between Chicago and the Missouri River had voted not to strike.

Sioux City dispatches say that reports from authentic sources there state that all engineers on the Chicago, St. Paul, Minneapolis & Omaha lines have refused to strike.

ENGINEERS WON'T STRIKE.

E. E. Kerwin, general superintendent of the Minneapolis & St. Louis Railroad, announced that he had been advised by representatives of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers of his road that the engineers would not go on strike.

George R. Huntington, general manager of the Minneapolis, St. Paul & Sault Ste. Marie Railroad, authorized the announcement that assurances had been received from 40 per cent of the conductors and brakemen of that road, members of the brotherhoods, that they would not obey a strike order. Engineers and firemen of the road did not take a strike vote because of a three-year contract still in force.

Announcement was made at the office of Vice President Herbert, of the St. Louis Southwestern (Cotton Belt) Railroad, at St. Louis, that a large number of trainmen employed by that road would not strike.

President E. E. Calvin, of the Union Pacific, telegraphed:

"All of our engineers would remain at work in event of a strike, and we have the assurance that a very large percentage of conductors and other train employees would refuse to cease work."

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I do not vouch for the correctness of that dispatch, and yet it corresponds with the feeling that I have had on this subject all along. I never have believed that these men would strike; I never have believed that they would dare to disrupt transportation and paralyze the commerce of this country by a strike at the present time, and I think very likely that that dispatch states the exact truth, that the membership of those brotherhoods are now awakening to the fact that there is danger—danger to them, danger to the interests of union labor, Mr. President—if these gentlemen insist that Congress must pass a law this very day, almost this very hour, or else this great disaster which they threaten will be visited upon the people of this country. I believe that they have come to the conclusion that they should "stop, look, and listen" before taking action.

Mr. President, in this matter I speak for myself alone. The vote I shall cast I shall alone be responsible for, but under existing conditions my duty to the great body of the citizenship of this country is so plain that I do not hesitate to say that I shall vote against the passage of this bill.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, it was no part of my purpose to say anything further upon this bill than that which was embraced in the very brief remarks I made on yesterday, but there has been so much of misrepresentation, so much of misstatement regarding the issues now before Congress, that I think some one ought to state the case as it is. One of the commonest things in the world is for men to erect straw figures and then, with a heroism that challenges the admiration of all who do not know that the figure is straw, to charge upon the dummy and destroy it. My purpose in rising is, if possible, to bring this debate back to the record, back to the facts, and to take it out of the realm of fancy and imagination.

It has been said here that the railway employees, like highwaymen, stand with their pistols at the head of Congress with the words "stand and deliver" upon their lips. The question is presented to the public on the floor of the Senate as though union labor had sent its representatives to Congress with a message to the effect that unless an eight-hour day is granted by law they will strike and tie up the business of the country, and that because the men stand with drawn pistols the Congress of the United States is cowering and begging for mercy and yielding to the demands of force. Now, the statements may have been made in good faith, but if made in good faith they have fallen from the lips of ignorance; they were not the expressions of men who are advised.

What are the facts? The facts are that the railway employees have for many years been organized. They have for many years, through their representatives, bargained with the managements of railroads with reference to wage scales, hours of labor, and all of the incidental questions. For the most part they make agreements which are to stand a year, and unless abrogated by one or the other these agreements frequently run over a long term of years. But all of the agreements, or practically all of them, contain a clause giving the right to either party to the agreement, upon 30 days' notice, to demand a modification or change or abrogation of the contract. That right has been often exercised both by the men and by the companies.

Acting, therefore, strictly within the rights reserved in their contracts, the men served notice that they desired an eight-hour day and overtime pay in the event the eight-hour period was exceeded. The managers of the roads met the representatives of the men in numerous conferences, with the result that no agreement was reached. At that stage of the negotiations the representatives of the men submitted to the men the question as to whether they should have authority to order a strike in the event an agreement was not reached. That strike referendum vote was carried by an enormous majority. Again the representatives of the men appealed to the representatives of the companies, and the representatives of the companies refused to yield the eight-hour demand. The companies, in fact, refused to yield anything. They, however, did say that they would arbitrate the eight-hour question which the men raised, but that they would at the same time insist upon submitting along with the eight-hour question many other questions which had been settled for long periods of time and had slumbered for many years.

Thereupon the men and the companies came to a point of sharp disagreement, and it appeared that the men were about to call a strike. Neither side had appealed to Congress. Neither side had appealed to the President. It was manifest that a war between the employees and the companies was imminent, impending, and about to fall upon the land. In that situation of affairs the President of the United States, upon his own motion, sent for the representatives of the men and asked them to meet him in Washington to discuss some plan to avert this national calamity.

The men came and submitted their proposition. Afterwards the President called in the representatives of the companies and asked them to discuss the question with him. The representatives of the companies told the President that they would not concede the eight-hour day; that they were willing to arbitrate, but that they insisted upon arbitrating not only the eight-hour day but many other questions. In that condition of affairs the President again appealed to the representatives of the men, and finally the representatives of the men stated that if the eight-hour day was conceded to them under some kind of temporary arrangement, so that some word could be sent out to the 450,000 men over the country that eight hours had been conceded, even temporarily, then the men would assent to the arbitration of every question; but they asked as a preliminary the temporary concession of the eight-hour day.

Thereupon the railroad managements took the responsibility of saying that they would permit a strike, the paralysis of the business of this country, the entire destruction of our commerce and our transportation, with all the incidental suffering and misery it would entail, rather than even temporarily to concede the eight hours, although they were guaranteed a full arbitration through a commission to be appointed by the President, and although they were practically guaranteed by the President that if it became necessary in order to meet additional expense to have additional freight rates the necessary legislation would be enacted.

In that situation, the President finding that he could not prevail upon the managers to yield, the President brought this question to Congress. The men did not bring it here. The men who declare they brought it here assert that which is untrue, that which they ought to know is untrue. Not only did the men not bring it here, but Mr. Garretson, one of their chief representatives, very early in his testimony, stated:

It is a misfortune, and no reasonable man on either side denies it, and I believe that if a settlement can be effected by Congress, even though we are in every essential opposed to the settlement of such questions by the legislative method, that it would be considered desirable and will have the reasonable aid of both parties. For our own side, we waive the age-old traditions of these unions, and accept a legislative settlement.

Is that the talk of a man with a gun in his hand, saying, "Stand and deliver?" Or is that not rather the talk of a man who, recognizing that a great calamity may be precipitated, is willing to do what he can in reason to avoid the consummation of that calamity?

Mr. President, what, then, is the attitude of Congress? Is it being coerced by labor? Is it being coerced by the railroads? Neither can be justly said to be the case.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. REED. In a moment. A condition has arisen. Two opposing forces have gone into the open. They are ranging themselves upon the field of battle. They are asking no odds and no assistance. But that battle, when it occurs, is to produce a condition in the entire land that will affect the entire population; and accordingly the President of the United States, acting within his constitutional prerogatives and in strict accordance with his duty, comes to Congress and states to Congress, "Here is this condition. What can you do to prevent it?" Congress, acting with some common sense and reason, is proceeding to try and prevent it; and all the mock heroics of all the pretended statesmen, the performances of all those gentlemen who like to parade in the sunlight and strut in public as defenders of the Constitution and the protectors of the dignity of the country, will never deceive the people of this land with reference to this one vital and important fact—namely, that the action that Congress is about to take is an action taken on behalf of the American people to meet the demands of a great necessity, and that it is not a cowardly surrender. The cowards in Congress, if there be any here, are those gentlemen who refuse to accept their share of responsibility, who, like a lot of Pharisees, stand aside, wrapping the garment of their holiness about themselves, proclaiming to the world, "We are not as you wicked men who would avert this strike. Behold us! We are too holy, too good to do our share to stop a great national calamity. Let it fall. We will not soil our holy hands!"

Mr. President, I have no patience, either, with those gentlemen who would load down this emergency measure with a great number of things which, if they are attached to the bill, will make it impossible to pass the bill in time to prevent the strike. There is more than one way of killing legislation. One way is to vote against it. Another way familiar to the Senate is to talk it to death. A third way is to amend a proposition to death—to so amend it that men can not vote for it; to so amend it as to render it unworkable. In this case the amendment proposed will, if adopted, very likely provoke a strike.

Mr. President, I want to say to this body that there is not a man on the other side nor on this side who would dare vote against this bill if he knew his vote would produce the strike; but they are quite willing to try and escape responsibility and assume the superior air of critics while the Democrats put out the fire. There will, I hope, be some good Republicans to help us put it out.

I desire, Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is compelled to inform the Senator——

Mr. REED. My time is up, I know. I am making a request to have read an editorial from the New York World of yesterday. I do not know whether, under the unanimous-consent agreement, it can be read out of my time or not.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, if I am entitled to any time I give it to the Senator for that purpose.

Mr. REED. That can not be done; but the Senator can read it if he will.

Mr. THOMAS. I will read it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Colorado as having addressed the Chair for the purpose of addressing the Senate; and the Chair now recognizes the Senator from Colorado addressing the Chair.

Mr. THOMAS. The editorial is entitled:

PUT OUT THE FIRE FIRST.

The people who censure Congress for hastily adopting emergency legislation to prevent a railroad strike are either fools or they want a strike.

If Congress failed to rush this legislation through and a strike followed, these same people before Tuesday night would be imploring Congress and the President and all the agencies of Government to settle the strike at once and on any terms.

The most hysterical shouters for a settlement would be the members of chambers of commerce and manufacturers' associations who so smugly deplore the "surrender" of the United States Government to the pernicious demands of trades-unionism. The minute their pocket nerve was touched by the tie-up of traffic, there would not be enough ears in the country to respond to their screams.

These self-appointed critics of the President and Congress have caught the spirit of bluff from the railroads and the unions, and think they ought to make a voluntary contribution of their own to the national store of hypocrisy and false pretenses. They are all very brave and resolute until the strike comes. Then they would be the first to run to cover.

The immediate business of Congress in the matter of legislation dealing with this railroad situation is to pass the bills that will give the public guaranties that no strike will take place. The next is to prepare with due care and caution a code of legislation that will safeguard the country in the future. Congress is dealing with a condition, not a theory. The first duty of a doctor in an emergency case is to save the patient's life, not to prescribe a system of moral and economic conduct for him in the event that he survives.

There is no reason why Congress should concern itself at this time with the wailings of the railroad presidents against the eight-hour bill. The railroad presidents helped to create this situation. They still want a strike. They would be glad to see every facility of transportation paralyzed if they thought it would wreck the unions. They have no more regard for the rights of the American people in this crisis than the brotherhood leaders have shown, and no tears need be shed over them because Congress is jamming an experimental eight-hour law down their throats. Any injustice that is done to their stockholders is sure to be remedied.

Congress in this matter is on the side of the public, and that is where Congress ought to be. The advocates of delay are the advocates of a strike and of national disaster.

It is silly to charge Congress with surrendering to the unions. The unions had a legal right to strike when the strike was ordered. There is not a line on any statute book which prevents their striking, nor could any law be enacted before Monday which would compel them to work. Whatever their moral guilt may be, they are within the law when they do the thing that they threaten to do. Therefore, it is the duty of Congress to take such practicable means as may be adopted at once to remove the excuse for a strike. Whatever further adjustments are necessary can be left for the future. That is the common-sense method, and Congress is displaying far more intelligence and patriotism than its critics.

The rights and wrongs of this controversy are yet to be determined so far as they affect the railroads and their employees. But the rights and wrongs of a railroad strike, so far as they affect the public, are obvious and incontestable. A philosophic fire department might plausibly contend that its chief duty was not to extinguish the flames, but to frame a fireproof-building code and strengthen the laws against arson. That would no doubt be an admirable public service, but in the meantime the building would burn down, the fire would communicate itself to other buildings, and a whole community would be left homeless.

We prefer the congressional way of putting out the fire first, and determining later whether it was of incendiary origin or due to defective wiring, and whether the owner can legally collect his insurance.

Mr. LEE of Maryland obtained the floor.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Did the Senator from Mississippi rise to address the Chair?

Mr. VARDAMAN. Yes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maryland was recognized in accordance with the order of speaking heretofore arranged——

Mr. VARDAMAN. I yield to the Senator from Maryland, then.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Unless the Senator from Mississippi had a query to address to the Chair, the Chair desired to inform the Senator from Mississippi why he was apparently disregarding him.

Mr. LEE of Maryland. I shall be glad to have the Senator from Mississippi proceed.

Mr. VARDAMAN. No; I will not interfere with the Senator's remarks.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I want to say a word.

I had hoped and believed that a great question of this character could be determined far above and away from any political considerations. I hope there may be some questions in Congress that we can solve in a spirit of patriotism instead of any spirit of partisanism. Every man in this Chamber, I am sure, has approached this question in no pharisaical way, but with that seriousness which becomes serious-minded men in the consideration of the most serious questions that can affect the life of the Republic, the happiness and welfare of our people.

I find myself in a position where I can not support the amendment of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], nor can I vote for the bill. I believe the amendment of the Senator from Alabama, if adopted, would absolutely destroy union labor in this country. I believe in union labor. It has served and will serve a useful purpose in this Nation. I am not ready to strike the blow that this amendment would strike at union labor.

Mr. President, in my short time in Congress I have voted, I think, rather consistently for every measure that would benefit the condition of the man who toils and help to make his existence a little better and a little easier. I believe in an eight-hour day in our industrial life. There may be circumstances in certain industries where it could not be brought about; but as a general proposition I am ready and anxious to assist in all movements looking to an eight-hour day for the man who toils.

Eight hours for work, eight hours for recreation, and eight hours for rest is the ideal day. It will make for better homes in our Republic, for better lives, and for better citizenship, and it is a part of the great structure of social justice that many people dream may become an actuality some day in this Republic; and I believe it is coming. The eight-hour day must come in industrial life.

This bill is not an eight-hour-day bill. That has been shown by the testimony before the committee. It was stated—I heard the statement; I tried to attend most of the hearings of the committee—that the railroads would prefer to go on and pay for the extra time; it would be more economical. So we do not have the humane measure of an eight-hour bill. It is not that. It is merely a bill to increase wages, and we may as well face that frankly. To call it an eight-hour-a-day bill is a fraud.

I have a great sympathy with the men in these brotherhoods. I heard the testimony of Mr. Garretson. I have known him for years. There is not a better citizen in the Republic; there is not a more patriotic man. The men in these brotherhoods are just as patriotic as people who may criticize them, and would just as quickly go out in the defense of their country and their flag as many people who now are assailing them as traitors to their country. Mr. Garretson pictured in a most dramatic way how, when asked by the President to postpone this strike, he had come to his Gethsemane. I guess it is true that in most men's lives there comes a time when they carry their cross to their Gethsemane. Looking at that man that night doing his duty as he saw it anyone could see that he was carrying his cross to his Gethsemane.

I sympathize with him. I wish I could vote for some measures to help these men. I do not believe for one instant that in voting for this bill I would vote to help them.

I can not have the same sympathy with the railroad presidents and executive officers. I have noticed great railroad properties in this country wrecked by the men in power; great sums voted as presents to men leaving employment, as the Rock Island investigation showed a great sum was voted to the general solicitor of that road as a present; actions upon the part of men high in authority in the San Francisco Road and the New York, New Haven & Hartford Road that ought to make them adorn prison cells. I can not have the same feeling for them somehow or other, especially in view of the extravagant salaries many of them are receiving.

But outside of all sympathy, what is the proposition, and what is Congress asked to do? This is a proposition of 10 hours' pay for 8 hours' work. That is the proposition; and more vital than that is for Congress, without any information or investigation, by law to say that that thing shall be done.

Mr. President, that may be right. It does not strike one at first blush that it is right, but it may be right. I do not know. That is why I shall vote against this bill. I want to know. I want to know the relationship and effect that taking this money to pay these men this 25 per cent addition will have upon the other men working upon the railroads. How about the section men out in the night and in the storm and in the cold, protecting the trains? How about the switchmen? How about the station agents that the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] referred to the other day, in the lonely places trying to eke out an existence? Those are questions I want to know about before I am compelled to vote, and I propose to know about them before anybody compels me to vote on this proposition.

How about the shippers? How about the farmers? How about the men who are going to pay this $60,000,000, the railroads say—$20,000,000, the men say? Now, a little does not make any difference, we say, added to freight rates. Every little is added to every other little—fifty millions in the last year of freight rates. Pass it on to that myth known as the "ultimate consumer." I want to know about that. I want to know if we can save this sum in the economical management of railroads, instead of passing the burden on to the consumer. People other than railroad managers and employees are interested in this question.

So I oppose this bill, not because I am opposed to an eight-hour day, for I favor that. I oppose it for two reasons. One is that in my judgment the bill is a humbug; that it will give these men nothing that they desire. When the period of nine months is up they will be just where they are now, with a strike upon their hands. It gets nowhere. I oppose it, secondly, because of the great fundamental principle of government that Congress is abdicating its right to reasonable judgment and meditation upon the questions that come before it.

I can well see that men can vote for this bill in order to avoid a strike. That is the hard question that is put up, as it is, by the Senator from Missouri: "What would you do in the last analysis?" Men would have to take their position, whether they would vote for this bill and abdicate the fundamentals of this Government, as far as Congress is concerned, or face a strike. The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN] had a solution of that the other day—a joint resolution asking that this strike be postponed.

Does anyone imagine that these railway men, wise and patriotic as they are, with a resolution of that kind from Congress, would hesitate to postpone this strike and enable us to take up every question involved and settle it? If they would not do that, I would vote for a resolution or a law that would enable the President of the United States, if he did not have the power, in behalf of the great body politic of this country, to take over these roads on Monday morning and operate them if there was any strike. I do not believe there would be a strike. We have a duty to the millions of people in this country who are dependent upon our lines of transportation for the necessities of life. I do not propose to forget these unnumbered millions in my vote here.

Now, Mr. President, I think I shall not take any more of the time of the Senate.

This question should be decided in a spirit of patriotism and not partisanism—decided by a consideration of the question as to how it will affect the good of the greatest number, and not by a consideration of the question of how many votes it will affect.

I vote against this bill for two reasons, as hereinbefore stated:

First, it does not give the men what it purports to. It is not an eight-hour-day bill. It is a mere temporary makeshift that leaves them at the end of nine months in the same condition they are at the present. It is, in my judgment, a sham, a fraud, and a humbug.

Second, I vote against it because Congress has had no opportunity to consider its effect or to investigate the facts upon which the legislation for a proposed 10-hour pay for an 8-hour day is based. No opportunity to consider its relationship and effect upon the wages of others, or as to whether the burden is to be passed on to the shippers and consumers of the country or can be saved by economical railroad management. The verdict of the future, especially of labor itself, will, in my judgment, verify the statement that the best friends of labor to-day are the men who oppose the passage of this bill.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I realize the evil consequences of hasty legislation. It was my desire when this question first came before the Senate that a joint resolution be passed requesting the railroad employees to postpone the date of the strike until such time as would give the Congress an opportunity to examine the question in all its phases. I do not think it would have been beneath the dignity of the Congress, as some Senator suggested, to have done that, and I am sure it would have been an earnest to the railroad employees that Congress would treat them fairly, which would have caused them to cheerfully respond favorably to the request. The Congress did not do that, and the American people are confronted with a great industrial disaster. Borrowing from the late President Cleveland an expression which happily describes the situation, a condition and not a theory confronts us.

If the bill shall be passed by the Senate which has come to us from the House it will do one thing certain; it will avert the strike. I know it does not give any permanent relief to the laboring man or adjust permanently the differences between capital and labor. It is not intended as a piece of permanent legislation. It is a temporary structure contrived to bridge the chasm which has suddenly yawned at our feet. And it is a chasm that must be bridged, because we must cross it right now. To use another figure of speech, it may be a mere anesthetic to the patient who suffers. It will not cure the disease, but it will relieve the patient until the operation necessary to restore permanent health shall be performed.

If the bill shall pass, its provisions against which complaint is made do not go into effect until the 1st of January, 1917. It does not change the order of managing the railroads. It does not change the rate of wages. Congress will meet 30 days before the law goes into effect. In the meantime everything needful can be done to pass a permanent effective measure to meet the conditions which have arisen and which may arise in the meantime. No principle is violated. The rights of no class of people are violated.

The laboring men, the railroad employees, are satisfied with this bill. It will prevent a strike. There is no question about that. Then, if anything else needs to be done to protect the interests, which the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] a moment ago said ought to be passed, we will have ample opportunity from the 1st of December to the 1st of January to enact it. Should the matter be postponed or the bill defeated just because it does not, in the judgment of every Senator, appear to be the ideal thing to be done? I know it is an immature piece of legislation—an expedient to meet an emergency—and I am also aware of the fact that we are entering upon a new field of legislation, and we ought to be careful about what we do. But there is nothing in this bill that is hurtful to anybody. No harm can possibly come from it either in the enforcement of its provisions or as a precedent in legislation, but a very great good will surely result, to wit, the prevention of this strike, with all of its attendant evils. I shall vote for the bill.

I am not going to do anything knowingly that will add to the burdens which the taxpayers of this country are already bearing. I do not believe—but I am not going to enter upon a discussion of that question—that if the demands of the railroad men who are asking for an increase of wages were granted it would necessarily result in an increase in freight rates.

I believe that if the matter shall be investigated you would find that the profits of the railroads are great enough and the misappropriations of money in some instances have been large enough, if devoted to the payment of wages to the men who suffer and toil and die in order that the stocks may be worth the paper they are written on, to provide ample funds to make the increase in wages without levying any additional burden upon the shippers of the country. Of course, if the railroads are permitted to do it, they would double the freight rates and at the same time reduce the wages of the men and women whose toil keeps the road going one-half.

But, Mr. President, that is not the issue now. The question before Congress and the American people is the impending strike. I am not going to take the time of the Senate to try to find the men or the persons who are responsible for the strike. Certainly the employees of the railroads have done no more than they had a moral right to do. The railroad presidents have done no more than they had the legal right to do. The question is whether or not Congress, which sits here to represent the railroad presidents, the employees of the railroads, and the American people, is going to do the thing which will prevent the strike, avoid the disaster which will follow it, and open up the way by which Congress may legislate intelligently and permanently on this great question in the future.

The time will come, I believe, when the rights of the railroad employees will have to be determined by the Government through the instrumentality of the Interstate Commerce Commission, or some other commission created for that purpose, but we are not considering that just now, and now is not the time to consider it. We have not the time to maturely consider it. It is a matter of far-reaching concern and ought to be very carefully considered.

I submit if this bill is passed we will have until the 1st day of January to devise ways and means to meet any exigency that may arise.

There is another thing which ought to be considered, Mr. President, and that is that when we come here in December to take up this question the minds of Senators will not be warped and clouded by the mists and interests and prejudices of partisan politics. The election will be over, and we will be able to see this problem in its due proportions and do the thing needful to protect the interest of the American people.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I would make any reasonable concession to avoid the calamity which would undoubtedly follow from the strike, which is now dated for Monday. I would make any concession except that involving a principle which I deem fundamental. There are some things, of course, the value of which can not be measured in money or surrendered because of material loss. There are some things the value of which no man would permit to be measured against the loss of political friends or of political power.

Mr. President, a great deal has been said in the Chamber in regard to organized labor. Many eulogies have been delivered upon the leaders of organized labor. I presume that everyone who has given consideration to the subject in these times of modern industrialism will concede the virtue of organized labor, will concede its beneficence and its worth not only to those who are actual members of the organization, but the radiating influence and beneficence of unionism throughout the realm of labor, even though it be unorganized. I entertain, along with my colleagues, a profound belief in the virtues and the beneficent worth of organized labor. I have had my faith in organized labor pretty severely tested several times in my life; but notwithstanding these tests and experiences, I still retain the firm belief that organized labor is an essential and most vital element in the bettering of the conditions of the workingmen.

But, Mr. President, while I respect organized labor and believe in it, I am not fraid of it. I am not afraid of it because of my confidence and my faith in the great body of the workingmen. In all my experience I have never known a proposition fair and just to be rejected by the men who actually perform the labor.

It has been said that these labor leaders here were powerless to withdraw this strike order; that they were not in a position to render ineffective the order which had been sent out. I will not here and now dispute that proposition. I might be in error, and I do not want to pass judgment upon men so highly certified to in character as the leaders of these organizations, although I have my own opinion as to that proposition. I will concede, however, that contention to be true.

But we seemed to have overlooked the proposition that there were those who could have rendered nugatory that strike order, and that was the great body of men of whom and for whom these representatives here are merely the agents. The men who run the trains, who do the braking, who fire the engines, the rank and file of that noble class of men, could have rendered it nugatory. It was within their power to relieve their leaders, to put at ease the public, and to have done justice to themselves, and I have never doubted but that they would have done so had it been properly put up to them.

I will not join in an indictment against the intelligent and, I believe, loyal men who operate the trains of this country by saying that they would not have terminated this strike as soon as they were assured that the Executive and Congress were entering in good faith upon the investigation of this tremendous question. It is my candid opinion, and I speak, Mr. President, with some experience concerning these matters of organized labor, that if Congress had passed a resolution at the time the President passed this matter to Congress stating that it was entering upon a comprehensive investigation and consideration of this entire question in good faith for the purpose of arriving at an intelligent conclusion, passing upon and measuring the rights of each and all the parties to the controversy, and that it proposed to proceed with the consideration until it should be finally worked out to a fair conclusion for all parties, the men who are operating the trains of the country would have acceded to and accepted the good faith of Congress in that respect. They would have quickly responded to such a manifestation of purpose upon the part of the Government, a Government which they respect and honor.

Do you tell me that the men who now hold the respect of their neighbors, who now mingle with the best people of their respective communities, who are each day intrusted with the property and the lives of thousands, men who occupy a position of exceptional trust and fidelity, would not have accepted from the President of the United States and the Congress of their country a declaration that we were entering upon this matter with the fullest intent to solve it, and that they would not have postponed this calamity until such time as we could have done so in decency and in effectiveness and in comprehensiveness?

No severer indictment could be drawn against the patriotism and the character and the intelligence of these men than to say that notwithstanding they had put in action all the great powers of the Government they declined to give the powers of the Government an opportunity to intelligently pass upon it and would rather than do so enter upon a state of anarchy? Those who so charge would in my judgment libel these men.

No, Mr. President, they would not have done so; and these men who here say they were powerless and who approached, as they said, their Gethsemane if they should take a sidestep in regard to it, would have been aided and supported by the great rank and file of the men whom they represent.

I do not speak entirely, Mr. President, without knowledge in regard to that. I have not the honor of knowing the heads of these organizations; it has never been my pleasure nor my privilege to meet any of them, but I have some knowledge and some communication from some representing a considerable number of those whom they purport to represent, and we should have been within safe lines and on sure ground to have proceeded with this matter in circumspection and after investigation and with full information to the settlement of it.

Mr. President, proceeding as we do now, we proceed without information; we proceed without any facts whatever upon which to form a judgment. We have no information which leads us to one conclusion or another. We know nothing with reference to these wages in their relation to other wages; we know nothing, as the able Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] says, as to its ultimate effect upon the other people whom we represent. We are not permitted to know the facts. I should like to ask how legislators can legislate without facts upon which to form an opinion, unless we assume, as I indicated last night, that we are legislating by reason of the dictation of other powers? If we have no knowledge, no information, and yet write the law, we must be doing so at the will of some outside power.

I represent in part, Mr. President, a portion of the country which has suffered, and which does still suffer, by reason of high freight rates. There is many an industry in that region of the country which either remains undeveloped or which languishes by reason of its long distance from the market, by reason of the high freights which we pay coming in and going out.

This has restrained development in that vast northwestern empire for years, and I presume we must continue to bear the burdens to a large extent. Many a man in that country will bear witness to what I say. I want to know, Mr. President, before I vote to increase freight rates—because ultimately that is what this means—first, that these men are actually entitled upon the facts to have their wages increased; secondly, I want to know, if I can, what is the present income of the corporations from which they will most immediately receive their pay, and to what extent it must necessarily be passed on to those whom I represent as well as union labor. I represent all; and I will not, to my knowledge, sacrifice one to the interests of another.

We are not permitted to have this information. It is said to me that we must pass this bill before Saturday night or that these men will bring on the calamity. I say to you, and I believe I speak more nearly the sentiments of these men, that all we had to do was to give evidence of good faith in our determination to enter upon this investigation and to adjust it fairly as between all parties.

But, sir, if indeed we are up against the proposition that we are dealing with a body of men who would not permit Congress to have the facts or to take time to investigate and to pass intelligently upon them, if I have placed too high an estimate upon the character and patriotism of these men, and we are yielding to the suggestion and the dictation and the direction of these men, then, indeed, the Congress of the United States has met the great crisis of its history. If indeed, sir, we are met here with a demand which we can not postpone for information, which we must execute without information, and, most of all, if we propose to execute it without information, then indeed the spirit of the fathers has departed and the traditions of this body will soon be turned to shame and humiliation. If we are face to face with that proposition, then let us meet it with the spirit and courage which become the Senators of a great free Republic. Let us defy it on the threshold and call upon all the powers of the Government to move these trains and protect organized society.

And let us see, further, in what position organized labor is placing itself. The able Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] has offered an amendment to this bill which provides for the fixing of wages, which, in effect, would put the wage question under the control of the Interstate Commerce Commission. I want to warn the union-labor men of this country that that is the inevitable logic of the position which we occupy when we pass this bill. I want to say that the American people will never permit Congress to pass this kind of legislation unless there accompanies it provision for a tribunal which shall be clothed with the authority and the power to make full investigation and to fix wages for all men engaged in the service of the public utilities. The workingmen of the country have now conceded the right of Congress to fix wages, because, as said by the Senator from Iowa, that is the real contest. That is the concession, which, in my judgment, if it were submitted to the 400,000 men represented here, would be voted down by a vote of 85 per cent. It would receive condemnation from all union labor.

The first effect of this legislation, therefore, is to concede to some power—either the Congress or the tribunal created by it—the right to fix the wages of the men working upon the public utilities.

What is the second feature of the bill? It has been said that society has sanctioned the eight-hour day. Let us assume for the moment that the eight-hour day is in this bill; let us assume for the sake of the argument, and only for the sake of the argument, that that is true; what do we find?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore (at 3 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.). The time of the Senator from Idaho will expire at 3.30 o'clock.

Mr. BORAH. Thank you, Mr. President.

What do we find here in this bill? If society has sanctioned the eight-hour day, under what theory can either the brotherhoods or the Congress of the United States apply a great principle of humanity to 20 per cent of the men who operate the trains? What will the brotherhoods say to the vast concourse of men who will be there to greet them when they return to their homes? "We have succeeded in establishing a great principle of humanity." "For whom? For 20 per cent of us."

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Idaho yield to me there?

Mr. BORAH. Yes. I thank the Senator.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. And with a provision in it for pro rata pay for overtime.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, that is not the worst of it. This fact proves beyond question that the Congress of the United States is not exercising its judgment, is not exercising its discretion, is not exercising its patriotism; because I can not conceive that Congress, if free to choose in applying a great principle which society has sanctioned, would apply it to only 20 per cent of the men engaged in a single industry. What will the men out upon the other work in connection with the operation of these roads who are receiving a less wage, but who are taking care of situations just as critical and just as important to the traveling public, think of the Congress which refused to apply to them a principle which society has sanctioned? Why should we deal so parsimoniously with a great principle of humanity? Why not extend its beneficent worth to all in this industry?

Mr. President, it illustrates that we are proceeding in fear—in my judgment, ungrounded fear—in excitement, without the exercise of our own discretion and judgment, and without the facts before us which would enable us to proceed intelligently.

I repeat, sir, that if this Congress would pass a resolution this afternoon to the effect that we are not in favor of proceeding with this matter at this session of Congress, until we shall have comprehensively dealt with it, the strike would be as dead by Monday morning as it will be if this bill is passed. These men are not criminals or highwaymen. They are a high class of men and they would never strike. What this occasion needs is more faith in these men and more manliness and courage in ourselves. Congress would have reserved and preserved its dignity; we would have passed before we closed the session a comprehensive plan, representing the best judgment of the Congress, and the country would be given and the workingmen and all the people whom we represent generally would be given a compresensive plan, which would relieve them from this impending evil which will be resting upon them and over commerce every day of the next nine months. We should be relieved of that entirely. A great crisis needs decision, needs character, needs faith in the right and faith in American principles. These things are sadly lacking here. We have cringed and crawled, we have humiliated ourselves, debauched our Government, discredited union labor, and settled nothing permanently.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, with other Senators I agree that the legislation does not fully meet the situation. It is not complete. Its object is to meet temporarily a pending calamity. If this were a question involving only the brotherhoods and the railroads I could take one view of what my duty is and should be; but I think I realize the seriousness of the present situation.

It is said by some of those who have spoken that we are being "sandbagged." I do not quite understand what they mean when they use that expression; but assuming for the sake of the argument that it is correct, I do not think that Senators should take a position in open defiance of these various elements without at the same time taking into consideration the effect that it is going to have upon the public at large.

It is said that this situation affects only 400,000 workmen and the investors in the railroads. Oh, no; it affects the industries, the lives, the comforts of a hundred million people.

Senators say we have not had time to thoroughly investigate this subject. That is true. On Tuesday the President delivered his message; on Wednesday our Interstate Commerce Committee met in conference; on Thursday we held hearings and an executive session continuing into the night; and after deliberating we came to the conclusion that unless something was done to avert this calamity the strike would be on at 7 o'clock Monday morning. The chairman and members of the committee did what they could to persuade the representatives of the brotherhood to call off the strike and give more time; and I think they should have so done.

Some Senators have suggested that, if we had taken a different course, there would have been no strike. I do not know whether they speak in prophecy or think they state a fact. My belief is that they have no better opportunity of judging than I have, and it is my opinion, from the information I have, though I came to that conclusion reluctantly, that there will be a strike unless some legislation is passed akin to that incorporated in the pending bill.

This measure is only intended to be temporary in character. Those who have listened to the debates here in the Senate will agree with me that no one Senator has yet proposed a plan with which he is satisfied, or, if he is satisfied with a plan which is in his own mind, he has not as yet been able to persuade his colleagues that it would solve the existing problem.

Mr. President, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] referred to the fact that for nine months the President has known that there was a controversy pending. Yes, sir; and the Senator who referred to that fact knew it; but the President, no doubt, as well as the Senator, remembered that there is on the statute books the Newlands mediation act, which was adopted at the joint request of the railroad managements and the brotherhoods. Since its enactment two years ago the Board of Mediation have succeeded in settling 56 strikes or controversies; and we had reason to believe that, even in this situation, these parties would ultimately get together. It was only within the last two weeks that the President tendered his good offices, and only on Tuesday last did it become known that legislative action must be undertaken.

Mr. President, we have every assurance that the adoption of this bill is going to stop this strike. The bill does not go into effect until January 1. From six to nine months thereafter will be given for the purpose of investigation by a commission to be appointed by the President, and the plan that is proposed here is to continue for 30 days thereafter. Congress will be in session on the first Monday in December, and we will then have the opportunity to take up this question, to investigate it, to consider it thoroughly, and I am sure every Senator will have the courage to meet the situation and do what may seem to him to be right.

Mr. President, unsatisfactory though this legislation may be, bear in mind that, so far as we know, unless it is passed, when the hour of 7 o'clock strikes on Monday morning 400,000 men are going out of the railroad service, transportation will be stopped, the business of a hundred million people will be paralyzed. Within 10 days starvation and want will be in the midst of every center of population. Who are the men who will suffer? The wealthy men and those in moderate circumstances? No. The workingmen, their wives, their children, the poor of the land. That is the picture that I see before me. And, admitting, for the sake of the argument, that we are doing something now which we ought not to incorporate into permanent legislation, what is my duty? Senators, if that strike should come, with the knowledge, as we believe, that it can be averted by the adoption of this act, who is there here who would forgive himself if he knew that because of the failure to adopt this act we had permitted this calamity to come upon us?

My very learned friend the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] has suggested that he did not believe that the bill here would be a remedy for the evil. It is not going to be a complete remedy, but I am willing to adopt this remedy rather than to have a state of suspended animation in the industrial life of this country. This is not the first time in the history of Congress that we have had to adopt some temporary measure to meet a situation.

Now, one Senator proposes a reference of the wage question and the hours of work to the Interstate Commerce Commission. Many remedies have been suggested for industrial disputes. One of them is that there shall be no interference by any governmental function. That is one extreme. The other extreme is compulsory arbitration.

Between these two extremes may be mediation, voluntary arbitration, and investigation by a commission appointed for the purpose, and pending the investigation a suspension of the right to exercise either the strike or the lockout. With all due deference to the legislative skill of my colleagues, I do not believe there is anyone here who is willing to say, "I have the remedy."

Mr. President, I can not help but feel that if we were to fail to adopt this act, or something akin to it, we would be in part responsible for the conditions that might prevail. I have received in the last 48 hours many telegrams, many from labor organizations, many from chambers of commerce and large business interests in my State. They represent the two extreme views upon this subject. I am convinced from reading those telegrams that neither party fully understands the provisions of this bill or what will be the situation in the country if it is not passed. It is well for those who may be men of large means to say, "We would not submit to the passage of legislation of this kind." The parties to this controversy may take one view or the other; but the voice of those who will suffer the most if there should be a strike appeals to me more than all the telegrams that can come from the one extreme or the other, or from both.

Mr. President, if this bill is passed, as I hope it may be, and this strike thus averted, I shall be ready at any time to take up the further consideration of this subject, with the hope that by the united counsels of the Members of the Senate and of the House we can find some permanent solution for the pending disputes.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I think I appreciate just as fully as the Senator from Ohio the suffering and the conditions that will come to the people of this country if the strike should come as set for 7 o'clock on Monday morning. I think possibly in my community there would be more immediate suffering than in most other communities throughout the country; but for the reasons that have been suggested by Senators on this side of the Chamber I can not get the consent of my conscience and my judgment to vote for this bill.

I am not going to repeat those reasons. I simply want to emphasize one proposition that was presented very forcibly by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN].

The passage of this act will be the severest blow to the freedom of labor, individually and collectively, that it has ever received. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] says that those on both sides of this controversy who have been sending him telegrams, in his judgment, do not understand what this act means or what it does. I believe that is true. I do not believe that labor or the labor leaders really appreciate what is done by this act or how it affects or will affect them. Labor is vehemently opposed to compulsory arbitration. This act is a compulsory and arbitrary settlement of a private dispute. It forces one side to accept a proposition to which it is opposed, but which is the minimum demand of the other side. If we can settle this controversy by compelling employers to pay higher wages, we can settle another controversy by compelling the employees to accept lower wages. That will be the proposition that the labor leaders must take home and report to the people that they represent here. If we can fix the amount capital shall pay for labor, we can fix labor's wage. If we can compel capital to employ, we can compel labor to work. If we can compel capital to pay, we can compel labor to accept. The principle in the one case is exactly the principle in the other, and we assert that principle in this legislation. No such important principle should be adopted by this body without the most careful investigation and consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Are there other Senators who desire to address the Senate? Twelve minutes of the time remain.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I desire to tender, to lie on the table at this time, a resolution in the form of an amendment, to be called up later by me.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If no Senator desires to address the Senate further on the bill, the Chair will call attention to the text of the unanimous-consent agreement:

It is agreed by unanimous consent that at not later than 4 o'clock p. m., on the calendar day of Saturday, September 2, 1916, the Senate will proceed to vote upon any amendment that may be pending, any amendment that may be offered, and upon the bill H. R. 17700, an act to establish an eight-hour day for employees of carriers, etc., through the regular parliamentary stages to its final disposition; the vote upon the final passage of the bill to be taken not later than 6 o'clock p. m. on the said calendar day; also, that between the hours of 10 o'clock a. m. and 12 m. no Senator shall speak more than once nor longer than 30 minutes upon the bill; and, further, that after the hour of 12 o'clock m. on said day no Senator shall speak more than once nor longer than 15 minutes upon the bill, nor more than once nor longer than 5 minutes upon any amendment offered thereto.

The matter is somewhat in doubt. The Chair will lay the amendments before the Senate in the order in which they were offered. The Chair will suggest that it is entirely possible, under the literal text of the agreement, to consume the entire two hours on any single amendment; but no Senator will be allowed to occupy more than five minutes nor to speak more than once on any particular amendment.

The Secretary will state the first amendment.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I desire at this time, prior to the stating of the amendment, to suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois suggests the absence of a quorum. Let the Secretary call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bankhead	Cummins	Kern	Owen
Beckham	Curtis	Lane	Penrose
Borah	Dillingham	Lea, Tenn.	Pittman
Brady	Fletcher	Lee, Md.	Pomerene
Brandegee	Gallinger	Lewis	Ransdell
Bryan	Gronna	McCumber	Reed
Chamberlain	Hardwick	Martin, Va.	Robinson
Chilton	Hughes	Nelson	Saulsbury
Clapp	Husting	Newlands	Shafroth
Clarke, Ark.	Johnson, S. Dak.	Norris	Sheppard
Colt	Jones	Oliver	Sherman
Culberson	Kenyon	Overman	Shields
Simmons	Smith, S. C.	Taggart	Wadsworth
Smith, Ariz.	Smoot	Thomas	Walsh
Smith, Ga.	Sterling	Thompson	Warren
Smith, Md.	Stone	Underwood	Williams
Smith, Mich.	Swanson	Vardaman

Mr. HUGHES. I desire to announce the necessary absence of the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES]. He is detained from the Senate on important business, and is paired with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS].

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. TOWNSEND] on account of sickness in his family.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Sixty-seven Senators having answered to their names, a quorum of the Senate is present. The Secretary will state the pending amendment.

The SECRETARY. The pending amendment is the amendment of the junior Senator from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH] to the amendment of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], as follows: At the end of the amendment of the Senator from Alabama it is proposed to add the following proviso:

Provided, however, That nothing herein contained shall be construed as compelling the employees to work at the wages prescribed.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, the purpose of that amendment is to clear up, in the minds of the Senators, the provision as presented by the Senator from Alabama.

There was some dispute as to the meaning of that section. All agreed that it was not compulsory arbitration. All agreed that it was not intended to compel men to work for the wages that might be fixed. The Senator from Alabama insisted that the provision meant that they were not to be compelled to work; and it seemed to me that inasmuch as there were differences of opinion concerning it this language would clear up the matter so that there could be no dispute in relation to it. So I have provided in the amendment as follows:

Provided, however, That nothing herein contained shall be construed as compelling the employees to work at the wages prescribed.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I wish to say that there was nothing in the original amendment that I offered that was compulsory. It merely appealed to the court of public sentiment after the finding of a tribunal. There is no conflict between the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado and the original amendment that I offered; but if there is any doubt in the Senator's mind on this subject I am glad to accept his amendment to my amendment to clear up that doubt.

Mr. SHAFROTH. It seems to me it ought to be cleared up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama accepts the amendment of the Senator from Colorado to the pending amendment. The Secretary will state the amendment as amended.

Mr. LEE of Maryland. Mr. President, I offer two amendments to the pending amendment. In the third line of the amendment offered by the Senator from Alabama, after the words "reasonable wages," I move to insert the words "and conditions of labor"; and I move to make the same insertion in the tenth line, after the words "reasonable wages." I move to insert at that point also the words "and conditions of labor."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me to interrupt him, I suppose that that is intended to give the Interstate Commerce Commission an opportunity to look into all the complaints of labor in reference to their employment at the same time.

Mr. LEE of Maryland. It is to broaden the scope a little.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That is entirely in keeping with the purpose of my original amendment, and I am glad to accept it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama accepts the amendment to the amendment. The Secretary will report the amendment as it now stands.

The SECRETARY read as follows:

SEC. 5. That the Interstate Commerce Commission shall have the power to fix the hours of labor and determine just and reasonable wages and conditions of labor for all employees of the railroads named in section 1 of this act. The rate of wages and the hours of labor provided for in this act shall remain fixed for service and pay until changed by the decision of the Interstate Commerce Commission, which, within a period of not less than six nor more than twelve months from the passage of this act, shall determine what are just and reasonable wages and conditions of labor and what shall be the hours of labor for all employees of the railroads above mentioned: Provided, however, That nothing herein contained shall be construed as compelling the employees to work at the wages prescribed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. UNDERWOOD obtained the floor.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama has the floor.

Mr. NELSON. I move an amendment to the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do.

Mr. NELSON. I move to strike out the part referring to the employees so as to include all the railroad employees.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will state to the Senator that I do not think the Secretary finished reading the entire amendment. If the Secretary will read what is on the second page he will see that that is included.

The Secretary resumed and concluded the reading of the amendment as follows:

The Interstate Commerce Commission shall have the power from time to time to change the hours of labor and the rate of wages for all employees of the railroads named in section 1 of this act, either in whole or in part, upon its own initiative, on the petition of the employees, the managers of the railroads, or the public.

Mr. NELSON. The words that I want out are the railroad employees referred to in section 1 of the bill. I want it amended so as to cover all railroad employees.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama insists that the amendment does that now—that the last clause read by the Secretary has that effect.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will state to the Senator from Minnesota, if he will allow me at this time, that the amendment covers all interstate-commerce employees on the roads. We can not constitutionally go beyond that point. We have no power to go beyond the question of an interstate-commerce employee.

Mr. NELSON. If the Senator will allow me, I want to cover all the railroad employees on the interstate-commerce roads.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The amendment does that.

Mr. NELSON. It is limited to the employees under section 1 of the bill and that practically relates to all the employees who are now threatening to strike.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No; I beg the Senator's pardon; he is mistaken. It relates not to the employees of the railroads named in section 1 of the act, but it relates to all the interstate railroads.

Mr. NELSON. How can all the employees of railways be allowed to come in under your amendment?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will be glad to accept the Senator's amendment if it is not already covered.

Mr. NELSON. I do not think it does cover it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not see how it could be more broadly written.

Mr. NELSON. I have not a copy of the amendment before me, but I want to have it amended so that it will cover all railroad employees. Mr. President, I want the men who are not here before us with a threat to be put on an equal footing and have an equal showing with the men who are here threatening us with a strike unless we pass this legislation.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the Senator from Minnesota I am in thorough accord with his view, and the amendment I have offered does just exactly what he suggests.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the Senator from Minnesota will read the matter which appears on page 2 of the amendment he will discover that it is as broad as the amendment he now proposes. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the Senator from Alabama, upon which the Senator from Alabama has the floor.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will state that the doubt in the mind of the Senator from Minnesota arose from the question as to whether the word "named" applies to employees or to railroads.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It does apply to railroads. It could not apply to anything else.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama has the floor.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I was speaking in the time of the Senator from Minnesota. I desire recognition at the proper time.

Mr. NELSON. I have not yielded the floor. On a closer inspection of the amendment I think the Senator from Alabama is right. It reads—for all employees of the railroads named in section 1 of this act.

I think the Senator from Alabama is correct, and I congratulate him on having his amendment so broad that it will include all railroad men.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, on yesterday I consumed more of the time of the Senate than I intended to in discussing this question. I have only a few words to say now that the amendment comes up for consideration.

The bill without this amendment means nothing. There is no permanent solution of the situation for the future. All that I have offered to the Congress is a court of arbitration where all sides may have an opportunity to be heard. It is true that if the verdict of that court is satisfactory to the men the railroads will have to accept it, because it will be governing so far as they are concerned. If it is not satisfactory to the men the men have a right to reject it, and the only coercion that they would face if they rejected the finding of the verdict of the Interstate Commerce Commission would be the question of public sentiment, and in the end they must stand the test of public opinion on all their efforts. They can not maintain a strike for a day or an hour when the sentiment of the American people is against them.

There is no coercion in this matter, but I say that the bill as it stands without this amendment is an absolute abandonment of the court of arbitration, and Congress has taken unto itself the right to fix the wages of interstate commerce without a hearing from either side. It may be satisfactory to the men employed on the great railroads of the country to-day to take this verdict of Congress because the verdict is for them, but I ask those men if to-morrow they will be satisfied with a verdict of the Congress in reference to their rates of wages if that verdict is against them. If Congress is to render these verdicts without consideration and without an opportunity for one side or the other to be heard, or what I am proposing is a permanent court of arbitration, a court that compels no man except so far as public sentiment will compel him.

If we do not present some affirmative legislation at this stage of the bill then the American people are of necessity compelled to say that Congress paid the price of peace without attempting permanently to solve the great question that they were confronted with. We, as the representatives of the American people, can not afford to take that stand. It is not just to our constituencies. There must be a solution of this question that will be fair to all railway employees and fair to the shipping public of this country. You must find it. If you say that you can not find it because the time is too short, then you should postpone action on this bill. When the bill passed the House of Representatives I am informed that the order went out to stop the strike until the Senate had an opportunity to legislate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I favor this amendment. It was favored by the Interstate Commerce Committee and included as a part of the bill reported to the Senate. I favor it because it does something in the way of preserving the general balance of legislation which the President sought to insure in his recommendations.

The President's recommendations covered not only a temporary allowance of the 8-hour day, with 10 hours' pay, but provisions for the ascertainment of the cost of the change, in order that the cost might be fairly considered in the distribution of burdens as between the investors in the railways and the shippers and consuming public. Those recommendations also covered a provision intended to guard against future emergencies of this character by authorizing a board of investigation of the facts in every similar controversy, with a stay of the privilege to engage either in a strike or a lockout during the period of investigation.

The Senate committee was disinclined to go into that phase of the legislation, leaving it for the future. The House committee was similarly disinclined. But the Senate committee did see the wisdom of including in the bill balancing legislation, intended in some degree to secure the future against emergencies of this kind. One of the provisions was that offered by the Senator from Alabama and another was the provision that any willful hindrance or obstruction of trains operating in interstate commerce should be regarded as a misdemeanor and punished accordingly, just as any obstruction of the mails is prohibited by law and made a punishable offense.

The view of the committee was that it is as serious an offense to hinder and impede and obstruct a train engaged in interstate commerce, carrying food and other commodities to the people, as it is to obstruct conveyances carrying the mails. Indeed, it is more serious, for the former affects life itself.

So I urge upon the Senate favorable action regarding these two amendments, which preserve the general equilibrium of this legislation, which deprives our action of the appearance of a surrender to force, and which properly meet existing conditions in such a way in fairness to all interested parties as to minimize the danger of similar emergencies.

The effect of both these amendments will be to eliminate force as an element in our industrial life and to apply the law of reason after hearing through the tribunals which society creates for the adjustment of industrial contentions, and they harmonize with the spirit of the age now suffering under the application of the doctrine of force as it has never suffered before.

I shall insert in my remarks the recommendations of the President as well as the two amendments now proposed by the Senator from Alabama and myself to the House bill upon the lines of similar provisions in the Senate bill.

EXTRACT FROM THE PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE OF AUGUST 29, 1916.

First, immediate provision for the enlargement and administrative reorganization of the Interstate Commerce Commission along the lines embodied in the bill recently passed by the House of Representatives and now awaiting action by the Senate, in order that the commission may be enabled to deal with the many great and various duties now devolving upon it with a promptness and thoroughness which are with its present constitution and means of action practically impossible.

Second, the establishment of an eight-hour day as the legal basis alike of work and of wages in the employment of all railway employees who are actually engaged in the work of operating trains in interstate transportation.

Third, the authorization of the appointment by the President of a small body of men to observe the actual results in experience of the adoption of the eight-hour day in railway transportation alike for the men and for the railroads; its effects in the matter of operating costs, in the application of the existing practices and agreements to the new conditions, and in all other practical aspects, with the provision that the investigators shall report their conclusions to the Congress at the earliest possible date, but without recommendation as to legislative action, in order that the public may learn from an unprejudiced source just what actual developments have ensued.

Fourth, explicit approval by the Congress of the consideration by the Interstate Commerce Commission of an increase of freight rates to meet such additional expenditures by the railroads as may have been rendered necessary by the adoption of the eight-hour day and which have not been offset by administrative readjustments and economies, should the facts disclosed justify the increase.

Fifth, an amendment of the existing Federal statute which provides for the mediation, conciliation, and arbitration of such controversies as the present by adding to it a provision that in case the methods of accommodation now provided for should fail a full public investigation of the merits of every such dispute shall be instituted and completed before a strike or lockout may lawfully be attempted.

And, sixth, the lodgment in the hands of the Executive of the power, in case of military necessity, to take control of such portions and such rolling stock of the railways of the country as may be required for military use and to operate them for military purposes, with authority to draft into the military service of the United States such train crews and administrative officials as the circumstances require for their safe and efficient use.

THE UNDERWOOD AMENDMENT.

Amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. UNDERWOOD to the bill (H. R. 17700) to establish an eight-hour day for employees of carriers engaged in interstate and foreign commerce, and for other purposes, viz: Add at the end of the bill a new section, as follows:

"SEC. 5. That the Interstate Commerce Commission shall have the power to fix the hours of labor and determine just and reasonable wages for all employees of the railroads named in section 1 of this act. The rate of wages and the hours of labor provided for in this act shall remain fixed for service and pay until changed by the decision of the Interstate Commerce Commission, which, within a period of not less than 6 nor more than 12 months from the passage of this act, shall determine what are just and reasonable wages and what shall be the hours of labor for all employees of the railroads above mentioned.

"The Interstate Commerce Commission shall have the power from time to time to change the hours of labor and the rate of wages for all employees of the railroads named in section 1 of this act, either in whole or in part, upon its own initiative, on the petition of the employees, the managers of the railroads, or the public."

THE NEWLANDS AMENDMENT.

Amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. NEWLANDS to the bill (H. R. 17700) to establish an eight-hour day for employees of carriers engaged in interstate and foreign commerce, and for other purposes, viz: Add at the end of the bill a new section, as follows:

"SEC. —. Any person who shall knowingly and willfully obstruct or retard the operation of trains mentioned in section 1 of this act shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and be punished by a fine not exceeding $100 or imprisonment not exceeding six months, or both."

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I am not familiar with the rules of the House of Representatives. I therefore ask the Senator from Alabama whether it is not true that one or at least a small number of the House can at any time raise the question of a quorum?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Under the rules of the House of Representatives any Member can suggest that there is not a quorum present, when the Speaker of the House usually counts to see if there is a quorum present, and if there is not a quorum present, the roll is called.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the strike is called for Monday. My information is that unless this bill is passed, and passed in time so that word can be sent all over the country before Monday shall arrive, the strike will occur. I do not know upon what authority the Senator makes the statement that he understands the strike has already been called off.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I read a statement of that kind in a paper. I will read it to the Senator if he will allow me.

Mr. REED. If it does not take too much of my time.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It is only a short statement. In the Evening Star, of Saturday, September 2, first page, last column, I find the following:

"Just as soon as the House bill, unamended, becomes a law," A. B. Garretson, spokesman for the brotherhoods, said to-day, "the strike order will be recalled."

Mr. REED. Ah, just as soon as it becomes a law; that is to say, after we have passed the House bill and after it has——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will say to the Senator from Missouri that all these interruptions come out of the time of the Senator.

Mr. REED. I understand. And after it has been signed by the President, then the strike will be called off.

Now, that brings me to the only observation I desire to make. I have just talked with Judge ADAMSON, chairman of the committee having this measure in charge in the House. I saw him but a moment ago on the floor. He stated to me that there is not a quorum of the House of Representatives in the city of Washington, and that if this bill is sent back to the House the absence of a quorum could defeat its passage to-day; in fact, he said to me it would be utterly impossible to pass it. So, with that situation confronting us, and which we can not avoid, a strike is called for Monday, and, according to the best information we have, it will not be called off until this bill becomes a law. We must either pass the House bill without amendment or it can not become a law before Monday. That is the question that is before us. It is not a question as to what we would like to do, but what it is necessary to do in order to meet the present emergency. It is not a question whether we favor or do not favor as a legislative proposition the amendment of the distinguished Senator from Alabama, but it is a question, when we vote in favor of that amendment, whether we are willing to take the chance of the strike. So let us, in considering these amendments, understand that the addition of a word means that the bill can not become a law before the hour shall arrive when the strike will occur according to the call that was sent out.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I am opposed to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Alabama at this time. The Congress of the United States has appointed a commission consisting of members of the Interstate Commerce Committees of the Senate and the House. A copy of the joint resolution creating the commission I put in the RECORD this morning. It directs the commission, which has already been appointed and is organized, to investigate all the questions connected with interstate and foreign commerce and to report at the next session of Congress. Congress having charged that commission with the very duty which is the subject contained in the amendment of the Senator from Alabama, and that amendment being entirely unrelated, as it seems to me, to the subject matter in controversy—there being no emergency crisis as to that, at any rate—I do not see the object of attaching it to the pending bill.

It may become necessary, Mr. President, in the future to entirely realign and reassay the whole railroad situation of this country. It may be that the duties and the control which this Government is now exercising over the railway system of the country will come to comprehend the entire indicia of ownership and to control the operation of those great properties to such an extent that the Government can no longer decently or in fairness and justice assert every element of ownership and yet decline to assume any of the responsibility of its own act. However that may be, it is too large a subject to be decided at this minute on this floor. The amendment of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], no matter how much merit there may be in it, is open to the very same objection that the main bill is open to; it causes us to leap in the dark. The main bill allows us to undo what we are required to do without knowledge and afterwards to investigate the enormity of the destruction which we may have wrought.

Mr. President, to my mind, it is a humiliating admission which we have just heard from the lips of the Senator from Missouri. The House of Representatives having been compelled to pass this vital and entirely unprecedented measure at the demand of the Executive, and as written in the department, we are now told that the Senate must accept it in toto, without the dotting of an "i" or the crossing of a "t." Although the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce, at least, had had one day's hearing upon its own bill and had reported it as it thought it ought to pass, it was abandoned in a twinkling here on the floor after the debate upon it had proceeded for nearly half a day, and the House bill was, by unanimous consent, substituted in its place. The Senate, having wasted two days in this discussion, now to be told that it is all fruitless, that all amendments which have been made as the result of our deliberations are to be thrown in the waste basket, and that we are to pass the bill which has been hastily prepared by the other House, in its half-baked condition, at the demand of some alleged emergency which is said to exist in this country, I think is a disgrace not only to its present membership, but to the past history and the great traditions of the Senate of the United States.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, if the condition exists to which the Senator from Missouri called attention, then it will be impossible for this bill to become a law, because an enrolled bill can not be signed by the Speaker of the House, except in the presence of a quorum if the point is made. I quite agree with the comment of the Senator from Connecticut with regard to that situation. If the House acting yesterday upon an emergency, has now so far dissolved its membership as to be unable to secure a quorum, I do not consider that that is any reason why we should not deliberate and act upon our own judgment with reference to all these amendments; and if, because we do so, the bill should fail to become a law before Monday morning, the responsibility then must rest upon the House, which is without a quorum. Certainly we can not be charged with having failed to do our duty.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY].

Mr. BRADY. Mr. President, on yesterday I offered an amendment to the bill which had been reported by the Committee on Interstate Commerce. As the House bill has taken the place of the bill presented by the Committee on Interstate Commerce, I desire at this time to renew my amendment.

On page 1, line 2, I move to strike out of the amendment as proposed by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], after the word "fix," the words "the hours of labor"; and on page 2, line 2, to amend by striking out the words "hours of labor and the"; so that, if amended, the Interstate Commerce Commission shall have the power to fix just and reasonable wages for all employees; but they will not have the legal right or power to change the hours of labor.

It seems to me that we should not, under any circumstances, enact in one part of the bill a clause fixing the hours of labor and in another part of the bill give seven men the right to repeal it. I believe that at this time we ought to consider that matter, so that the Senate, in voting upon it, can decide whether it desires to support the proposition.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the Senator from Idaho, if he will allow me in his time, as my time has gone, that I put the words "the hours of labor" into the amendment in the interest of the men. At least three-fourths of the men engaged in railroad work have not their hours of labor fixed. This bill does not relate to them. I think more reasonable hours of labor ought to be granted to many of these men; but there is nothing in the bill that gives that to them. If these words remain in the bill and it becomes a law, then the Interstate Commerce Commission will hear their complaint, and they will have a day in court, and have an opportunity to appeal for more reasonable wages. I repeat it is in the interest of the men that the provision in reference to the hours of labor was put into the amendment, and not in the interest of the railroads or in the interest of the public. The intention was that these men should have a court in which they could have the hours of labor changed.

Mr. BRADY. We discussed that matter quite fully yesterday, and the Members who were then in the Senate will remember that the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] fully agreed with my views, that these words would permit the Interstate Commerce Commission to change the hours of labor. As I understand, we are fixing an eight-hour day for every man who receives any benefit from this bill; it does not matter whether he is engaged on an engine or otherwise engaged on a train. Just as surely as we do this we are giving to the commission the power to undo what shall have been done in the way of enacting this law.

I must say that I fully agree with the expression of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] that it is very apparent that this bill is going to pass as it came over from the other House, and that we are not going to change it by the dotting of an "i" or the crossing of a "t"; that this amendment will be voted down; but at the same time I want to go on record as expressing my view as to what it means before the amendment is voted on by the Senate, and also when it is voted upon I desire to express my disapproval of that part of the amendment. In the bill you simply follow the recommendations of the President in a single instance; and, while you are not changing this bill now, and while you are not enacting the first recommendation, which he probably considered the most important, you will either enact it when you return here in December, or, at least, your President will recommend that you enact it, or else he will be untrue to himself and to his country.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator's time has expired. The question is on the adoption of the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. BRADY. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. Can we have a vote now upon the amendment offered by me to the amendment of the Senator from Alabama?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Not if any Senator desires to debate it.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, if this amendment passes it makes no difference whether or not it is agreed to by the other House of Congress, it will not serve the purpose for which Congress is now in session. If Congress were not now in session considering this matter for the purpose of averting an impending strike, then it would be far better that all of this legislation be postponed until another session of Congress, when we could give it careful consideration. It is well known that the two bodies of Congress were not addressed by the President of the United States for the purpose of having them enter upon a general scheme of legislation covering this subject. It is known to every one of us here that Congress was appealed to for the purpose of attempting to prevent the most disastrous calamity that has ever threatened this country. Each one of us here realizes what the strike would mean. We have seen slight indications of it already. We have seen meat in this city nearly doubled in price. We have seen foodstuffs of all lines almost go beyond the reach of our people. We know that the present embargo is cutting off the foodstuffs of the people of this country. It does not take a very vivid imagination to realize that in one week after the strike is called there will be thousands of suffering little children throughout the great cities of this country who will be dying for the want of milk. In the face of such a situation are we to stand here and indulge in an academic discussion with regard to the proper methods of handling interstate commerce?

Are we to stand here and discuss the technical meaning of words, as to whether the fixing and determining of wages and hours of work shall be compulsory or not compulsory? If the determination is not compulsory now, it will later be made compulsory if such a provision as is contempated shall be enacted. Are we to stand here and argue whether the Interstate Commerce Commission, or some special commission or tribunal, is the proper body to handle the subject, when we have been brought together for the purpose of saving this country from a dire calamity? There is not a Senator here who does not know that if this amendment is adopted, then, by that very act, the strike is brought down upon the country. The Senator who votes for it will bear the burden; but his punishment will be very small in comparison with the amount of suffering that will have to be endured by the people of this country.

We know that if this bill passes with the proposed amendment attached, it will not be a satisfactory settlement to the labor men; it will be just exactly the settlement that the railroads offered to them, and nothing else. The railroad companies proposed that these rates be settled by arbitration, and the men said this question had been settled by the court of the people of this country, and the President of the United States agreed with them. It is now proposed to submit a question to arbitration that the employees refused to arbitrate, which they have said is not arbitral, and which the President has said is not arbitral. Do you not think that, if this amendment is attached to the bill, we are at that very minute proclaiming to the people of this country that there will be a strike? I want to know whether you are for that or not; I want to know whether you are willing to bear the burden of that strike; I am not.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I desire to correct, not perhaps so much the language of the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS], the chairman of the Interstate Commerce Committee, as the impression which would be gathered from his language as to the committee favoring this amendment.

There was a divided sentiment when this matter was considered in the committee yesterday, but some of us, not being willing to delay getting the measure before the Senate, although opposed to the amendment, rather than delay the session of the Senate by taking hours perhaps in discussing the amendment, tacitly agreed that the amendment might be reported favorably in order to bring it before the Senate.

I make that statement because I think a number of the members of the committee are opposed to the amendment, and the statement of the Senator from Nevada going unchallenged, more because of the impression which it conveyed than because of what he said might make it appear that Senators were inconsistent in their attitude.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to interrupt him a moment?

Mr. CLAPP. Yes.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I did not, of course, intend to convey the impression that there was a unanimous vote of the committee for this particular provision. I wished, however, to bring to the attention of the Senate the fact that the introduced matter is not new with reference to this legislation, but was contained in the Senate bill; that that bill was reported favorably by the Senate committee, and that it had the support of a majority of the committee. As to how many may have supported it, I believe the Senator himself has expressed his position and has indicated also the position of others.

Mr. CLAPP. I acquit the Senator of any purpose to create an impression that would not have been warranted by the facts; but I think, if the Senator will read his statement, he will realize that the somewhat emphatic manner in which it was made might lead to the impression that there was more general support of this amendment in the committee than really existed.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I regret that the time of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] has been exhausted, for I am about to make a statement with the sole view of getting information which I think he could furnish, and I am afraid that in making the statement I will consume the greater part of the five minutes I am permitted to occupy.

Mr. President, I can not read section 1 of the House bill 17700 without concluding that under the terms of that section it is intended to make the eight-hour-day provision permanent. It seems to me that that much is finally determined by this bill if it becomes a law. I am therefore inclined to favor the amendment offered by the junior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY]. He proposes to amend the amendment of the Senator from Alabama by striking out the words "the hours of labor" in the second line, so that the amendment would give the Interstate Commerce Commission the "power to fix and determine just and reasonable wages," but not to determine the hours of labor. The hours of labor are fixed—at least, the standard labor day is fixed—in the first section of this bill. I regard that section as undertaking to fix that much permanently, and if that be not so, then it ought to be so. That ought not to be longer left as an open question; and if the day's labor, which concerns the hours of labor—to wit, eight hours as the day's labor—is fixed in the bill, why should any commission or any executive body six months hence be authorized to sweep aside that legislative provision and fix some other standard of hours? That ought to be permanent, and there should be no juggling about it. I am not now objecting to the commission fixing wages. I believe there should be some provision looking to that end. There must be some public authority lodged somewhere to settle these disputes. But, Mr. President, we should differentiate, as I see it, while passing this bill, between the day's work, the hours of labor, and the wage to be paid per day or per hour. Let the standard day be fixed permanently, whatever else we may do.

Now, within my time, if I have any left—whatever is left—I ask the Senator from Alabama to enlighten me if I am wrong.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, the language in reference to that matter in the House bill and in the Senate bill is practically the same:

> That beginning January 1, 1917, eight hours shall, in contracts for labor and service, be deemed a day's work and the measure or standard of a day's work for the purpose of reckoning the compensation for services of all employees.

As stated yesterday, there is nothing in this bill fixing a day of labor. I have always voted for an eight-hour day. If it were practicable, I would do it in this instance; but there is no eight-hour-day provision in this bill.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, as I shall be compelled to vote against this amendment, I wish briefly to give my reasons. They are twofold:

In the first instance, this subject has become an acute one. It will not down. It will have to be considered, and considered generally, at a succeeding session of Congress. At that time we want to proceed to take up and enact a most comprehensive act. I do not want to forestall the free exercise of my judgment at that time by a premature action or vote at this particular time.

There is serious question as to whether we have the power to fix the compensation of laborers or employees at all. It is not an easy question to decide. If we have that authority, the next question is whether we can delegate it to a commission, the Interstate Commerce Commission or otherwise. We delegate or, in other words, we turn over to this commission the authority to fix compensation for the transfer of passengers or freight under a settled rule which we determine. We fix the standard by legislation; so that the act of the commission is not a legislative act. But is there any standard whatever that we can fix for labor? Will you say it is a reasonable compensation? How are you going to determine what is reasonable?

Here are two characters of labor. The one is unionized, and by the power of the union it raises itself gradually from $2 a day until it is receiving $5 a day. That is the customary charge. Therefore can you say that that is reasonable?

Here is another class of nonunionized labor, almost of the same character, that has not been able to raise its standard of wages from $2 to $5 a day. Will you say, because it is customary, that that is the usual charge and therefore reasonable? If that were true, then you could not raise the wages of the man that receives a dollar and a half or two dollars a day.

It is a most serious question, Mr. President, whether we have any authority whatever to fix a standard, and, secondly, if we have the authority, whether we can delegate it, having no power to fix the standard upon which it can be based.

Taking this particular amendment, Mr. President, our only authority to fix the compensation is based upon our control over interstate commerce. Is every employee of a railway company engaged in interstate commerce? Is the man who drives the president of the railway to his office engaged in interstate commerce, and can we fix his compensation? Where is your dividing line?

For instance, we will say that the people who operate the trains are certainly engaged in interstate commerce; but is the switchman, is the telegrapher, are the coal handlers, engaged in interstate commerce? If so, are the section men engaged in interstate commerce? You must have section men in order to carry on your commerce. If that be true, are the men who construct a sidetrack engaged in interstate commerce? If that be true again, are the men who build the railways engaged in interstate commerce?

All of those and their wages go to make up the basis of our fixing the charges for compensation as well as the charges for carrying freight and passengers; and yet can we reach so far as this, and fix the amount to be paid for men engaged in building a railway, simply because that fixes the standard?

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, in answer to the observations of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER], every single question that he has suggested was answered by this Congress when we passed the employers' liability bill, and we thereby determined exactly the classes of these employees to whom we could attach legislation under the interstate-commerce clause of the Constitution. There is not a single inch of untrodden ground on that question, in spite of the suggestion.

The Senator's suggestion that we can not set up a standard of wages when we delegate this power to the Interstate Commerce Commission will not appeal with much force to any lawyer in this land, who knows that every court in Christendom determines that question with the aid of a jury, the members of which are not even experts, every time it tries an action of quantum meruit, in the absence of an express contract as to what the services are worth or what labor shall cost and what shall be paid for it.

There is not a practical question of any sort raised by the Senator from North Dakota or by any Senator who opposes the submission of this question to the Interstate Commerce Commission. In my judgment, it is the real, permanent, safe, just, and absolutely correct solution of this question, and I earnestly hope the amendment will prevail.

Mr. HUSTING. Mr. President, I had intended to offer an amendment to this bill after this amendment should have been disposed of, but under the circumstances I have concluded not to offer it. The reason why I have concluded not to offer it is because I believe this bill ought to pass as it is, not because we are coerced by the House, not because we are coerced by the employees, not because we are coerced by anybody, but because I believe the people of the country want this strike averted.

Now, to us personally a strike does not mean anything. We will have enough to eat and a place to sleep. It is the people of the country who will suffer. The calamity will hit the people who toil for a living. It will hit the business man and the manufacturer, the farmer and the laborer.

It is a question of policy pure and simple that we must now decide. No one can compel or coerce us into passing this bill. We can refuse to pass it with the help of the Senators on the other side, who are going to vote against this bill. And in a spirit of bravado we can sneer at and invite the consequences, or we can take counsel of prudence and wisdom and stop the strike and attend to the equally important but less urgent questions later.

I say, it is not a question of coercion. It is a question of which is the better policy. Do we want this strike or do we not want it? The very fact that all the Senators here consented to a vote this afternoon—those on the other side as well as those on this side—shows that they recognize the urgency of action.

Senators on the other side who are going to vote against this bill and who are attacking it as an unwise and unwarranted measure could have prevented a vote upon this bill to-day. Any one Senator by a mere objection could have prevented a vote on this bill to-day and could thus have prevented its passage in time to prevent the strike. Why did they not do it? Because they did not dare shoulder the responsibility of opposing the prevention of the strike. If they thought the passage of the law was worse than the strike, it would have been their plain duty to have prevented a vote on this bill. The Senators on the other side, therefore, deep down in their hearts know that it is better to pass this bill than to have the strike. So I feel that nothing should be done now which will hinder, delay, or obstruct the passage of this bill.

The same reason that makes me feel constrained to withdraw my proposed amendment and to take it up next December is going to impel me to vote against the amendment of the Senator from Alabama. What is that amendment going to or what can it accomplish between now and December or between now and next March? The bill provides that a rule of wages shall be fixed until a report comes in here October of next year. It further provides that a commission of three members shall be appointed by the President, who are to report not later than October of next year. And this bill further provides that pending the filing of such report the hours of labor and the wages of the employees as fixed by this bill shall not be changed.

This amendment of the Senator from Alabama purports to give the Interstate Commerce Commission a right to fix the hours and the wages before this time limit expires in the other parts of the bill. It must be construed consistently with the other parts of the bill. Therefore its powers become effective only after October of next year.

Under the terms of this bill the Interstate Commerce Commission will not have a right to affect the wages of these men fixed in this bill before the time limit expires under the terms of the bill, so that this proposed amendment will have no effect whatever between now and October of next year, when the time limit expires.

Can not the matter, therefore, which the Senator suggests be dealt with next January or February or March or an extraordinary session? Will it serve a useful purpose to have it on the books merely as an earnest of something that we propose to do after next October, when we shall have time to deliberate on and debate these matters and when we shall have the facts reported to us by the commission or at least shall had time to have studied the subject? Is it not wiser to have all these other great questions settled whether they are in the bill or not; and can they not be better settled in the course of a session, whether of three months or longer, than in two or three hours of debate?

Why should we commit ourselves to a policy now on the spur of the moment of investing the Interstate Commerce Commission with certain powers when it will have no functions to perform in the premises, at least until October of next year, when by waiting for the facts a better plan may be proposed and a better system may be organized during the next or some future session of Congress?

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I am always doubtful of the correctness of my position on any question when I differ from the erudite Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD]. His distinguished service in this body and in the other branch of Congress gives anything that he may say great force and potency with me.

He says that if his amendment is not adopted there will be no permanency in this measure; but, really, I do not care for permanency in any legislation enacted under the stress under which this bill is now being considered. I do not care if you call it "bread-pill therapeutics," or what you may say about it; the bill as it came from the House will accomplish the great desideratum at this time. The thing we want to do, the thing we want to accomplish is the strike postponed, the atmosphere cleared, and the fearful apprehension which is paralyzing commerce and destroying the peace of mind of the Nation removed. The influences which lead men to think and act in partisan politics will be altogether absent when we come back here next December, and any defects in this bill can be remedied, and the permanent features can be ingrafted upon it before it takes effect. I think it would be eminently unfortunate if we should attempt to put anything in the bill at this time of a permanent character. For that reason I sincerely hope the bill will pass as it came from the House, without any amendment whatever.

I believe the time is not far distant when the idea embodied in the Senator's amendment—that these questions are to be settled by the Interstate Commerce Commission, or some other governmental tribunal—will be a part of the economy of this Government. Something will have to be done to take this matter out of the hands of selfish or irresponsible people, but now is not the time to do that.

For that reason I shall be compelled, though I do so reluctantly, to vote against the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY] to the amendment of the Senator from Alabama.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the adoption of the amendment offered by the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I ask for the yeas and nays on that.

So Mr. UNDERWOOD's amendment was rejected.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I offer the following amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada will be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add at the end of the bill a new section, as follows:

SEC. 5. Any person who shall knowingly and willfully obstruct or retard the operation of trains mentioned in section 1 of this act shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and be punished by a fine not exceeding $100, or imprisonment not exceeding six months, or both.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, the amendment which I have offered is almost identical in terms with section 201 of the criminal code of the United States relating to the obstruction of the mails. I will read the latter:

SEC. 201. Whoever shall knowingly and willfully obstruct or retard the passage of the mail, or any carriage, horse, driver, or carrier, or car, steamboat, or other conveyance or vessel carrying the same, shall be fined not more than $100 or imprisoned not more than six months, or both.

The statute in existence applies, as I stated before, only to the mails. The amendment which I have offered applies to the operation of trains in interstate commerce employed in carrying commodities and food, things much more essential to human life than the mails can be, for the latter are not essential at all.

Congress has seen fit to put upon the statute books a condemnation of any hindrance of the mails and it is clear to my mind that the legislation should be extended to the commodities transferred in interstate commerce and to the trains bearing them.

Mr. President, I stated before that the President had presented to us a scheme of balanced legislation, and in connection with that I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD, without reading, the tentative bill which was framed to comply with his suggestions regarding a commission of investigation, with a temporary stay during the investigation of that commission of the right either of strike or lockout, and also containing a provision empowering the President of the United States in a case of military necessity to take possession of the trains.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Such will be the order unless there is objection. The Chair hears none.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[Committee print.]

IN THE SENATE COMMITTEE ON INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

[The part printed in roman shows present law; the part in parentheses and italic indicates proposed amendments to existing law.]

A bill to amend an act entitled "An act providing for mediation, conciliation, and arbitration in controversies between certain employers and their employees," approved July 15, 1913.

Be it enacted, etc., That section 1 of an act entitled "An act providing for mediation, conciliation, and arbitration in controversies between certain employers and their employees," approved July 15, 1913, be amended so as to read as follows:

"SECTION 1. The provisions of this act shall apply to any common carrier or carriers and their officers, agents, and employees, except masters of vessels and seamen, as defined in section 4612, Revised Statutes of the United States, engaged in the transportation of passengers or property wholly by railroad, or partly by railroad and partly by water, for a continuous carriage or shipment from one State or Territory of the United States or the District of Columbia to any other State or Territory of the United States or the District of Columbia, or from any place in the United States to an adjacent foreign country, or from any place in the United States through a foreign country to any other place in the United States.

"The term 'railroad' as used in this act shall include all bridges and ferries used or operated in connection with any railroad, and also all the road in use by any corporation operating a railroad, whether owned or operated under a contract, agreement, or lease; and the term 'transportation' shall include all instrumentalities of shipment or carriage.

"The term 'employees' as used in this act shall include all persons [actually engaged in any capacity in train operation or train service of any description,] who are now or may hereafter be actually engaged in the operation of trains used for the transportation of persons or property on railroads from any State or Territory of the United States or the District of Columbia to any other State or Territory of the United States or the District of Columbia, or from one place in a Territory to another place in the same Territory, or from any place in the United States to an adjacent foreign country, or from any place in the United States through a foreign country to any other place in the United States, and notwithstanding that the cars upon or in which they are employed may be held and operated by the carrier under lease or other contract: Provided, however, That this act shall not be held to apply to employees of street railroads and shall apply only to employees engaged in railroad train service. In every such case the carrier shall be responsible for the acts and defaults of such employees in the same manner and to the same extent as if said cars were owned by it and said employees directly employed by it, and any provisions to the contrary of any such lease or other contract shall be binding only as between the parties thereto and shall not affect the obligations of said carrier either to the public or to the private parties concerned.

"A common carrier subject to the provisions of this act is hereinafter referred to as an 'employer,' and the employees of one or more of such carriers are hereinafter referred to as 'employees.'"

SEC. 2. That there be added at the end of said act the following:

"SEC. 12. Whenever a controversy shall arise between an employer or employers and employees subject to this act, which can not be settled through mediation and conciliation in the manner provided in section 2, and the Board of Mediation is unable to induce the parties to submit their controversy to arbitration in accordance with the provisions of this act, the said controversy shall be referred to a board of investigation, which shall consist of three members, of which each of the parties to the controversy shall recommend one, and these two, together with the third member, who shall act as chairman of the board, shall be appointed by the President of the United States. Upon notice by the President of the appointment of the board of investigation, the Board of Mediation and Conciliation shall arrange a time for the beginning of the investigation and a place where such proceedings may be held. The board of investigation shall organize and make all necessary rules for conducting its hearings. The board shall fully and carefully ascertain all the facts and circumstances, and in its report shall set forth such facts and circumstances and its findings therefrom, including the cause of the dispute and the board's recommendation for the settlement of the dispute according to the merits and substantial justice of the case. Its recommendation shall deal with each item of the dispute and shall state what in the board's opinion ought or ought not to be done by the respective parties concerned. Wherever it appears to the board expedient so to do, its recommendation shall also state the period during which the proposed settlement should continue in force and the date from which it should commence. The report shall be made to the Board of Mediation and Conciliation, who shall cause the same to be published.

"All testimony before the board of investigation shall be given under oath or affirmation, and any member of the board shall have the power to administer oaths or affirmations. It shall be furnished such assistants as may be necessary in carrying on its work.

"Each member of the board of investigation shall receive such compensation as may be fixed by the Board of Mediation and Conciliation, together with his traveling and other necessary expenses. So much as may be necessary of the appropriation of the Board of Mediation and Conciliation for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, is hereby made available for the payment of the necessary and proper expenses of boards of investigation. Authority for incurring expenses, including subsistence, by boards of investigation shall first be obtained from the Board of Mediation and Conciliation.

"SEC. 13. Pending the efforts of the Board of Mediation and Conciliation to induce the employer or employers and employees to submit their controversy to arbitration, and until the investigation of such controversy by the board of investigation provided for in section 12 of this act has been completed and its report thereon published, it shall be unlawful for the employer or employers to declare or cause a lockout, or for the employees, acting in combination, to declare or cause a strike on account of such controversy.

"SEC. 14. Any railroad company declaring or causing a lockout, or any officer or agent of any railroad company who assists or participates in declaring or causing a lockout contrary to the provisions of this act, shall be liable to a fine of not less than $500 nor more than $5,000 for each day or part of a day that such lockout exists.

"Any officer, agent, or employee of any organized body of labor or labor organization who declares or causes a strike contrary to the provisions of this act shall be liable to a fine of not less than $500 nor more than $5,000 for each day or part of a day that such strike exists.

"Any person who incites, encourages, or aids in any manner any employer to declare or continue a lockout, or any person who aids in any manner any officer, agent, or employee of any organized body of labor or labor organization in declaring or causing a strike contrary to the provisions of this act, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and liable to a fine of not less than $10 nor more than $100.

"SEC. 15. If at any time any railway engaged in interstate commerce or in the transportation of the mails shall cease to operate or be seriously hindered in its operation because of a strike of its employees, the President of the United States shall have power to direct the operation of such railway whenever in his judgment essential for military purposes, and to that end he may employ such part of the military forces or such civil agents or draft into the service of the United States such persons as he may deem necessary.

"Any person refusing when so drafted to perform the service for which drafted shall be guilty of a crime and shall, upon conviction thereof, be punished by fine not exceeding ———, by imprisonment not exceeding ———, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

"SEC. 16. Any provisions of said act of July 15, 1913, which are inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed."

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I have urged in committee and in personal communication with Senators the adoption of the President's entire program. The initial step having been taken by the President himself and the Government practically committed to an eight-hour day as a temporary standard of compensation, it would seem to me that the wisdom of his recommendations was manifest and that Congress ought to respond promptly and immediately in furnishing all the legislation required by his suggestions.

I found an indisposition in the other House among the membership generally and in the committee of which I am chairman to take up those subjects of legislation. They proposed to postpone them to the future. And so, finding that the majority of the committee was disposed to have a bill with some teeth in it, some provisions that at all events would in the future either prevent these emergencies or moderate their rigor, I cooperated, and the result was the incorporation in the Senate bill of certain provisions corresponding to the amendments subsequently offered by the Senator from Alabama and myself to the House bill now before us.

Mr. President, I can not see how any objection can be made by anyone to such legislation. If the railroad brotherhoods object, I assert, notwithstanding that, I stand for law and order. I stand for the right of every man to give up his employment if he wishes. I stand against his right to prevent by threats, force, or violence another man from taking his place. I stand for the legal restraint and punishment of the disorderly, the criminal, and the violent elements, not often conspicuous in the railroad brotherhoods, composed as they are of picked men of intelligence, character, and fidelity, but elements composed of the criminal and the vicious, particularly in large communities, who avail themselves of every social commotion to indulge in disorder and violence, and thus bring discredit upon legitmate and justifiable strikes. I stand also for the peaceful adjustment of industrial disputes through tribunals organized by society for that purpose, and with a view to a fair and humane adjustment of industrial conditions and wages.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore rapped with his gavel.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, my time has expired, and I will only add that, so far as I am concerned, I am willing to go upon the record with this legislation, whatever the consequences.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, the amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada is so nearly identical with the proposal I offered that I withdraw my amendment in favor of his.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, this amendment demonstrates again the impropriety of taking up this matter and dealing with it by piecemeal. If the amendment means that every act the operation of which is to prevent the movement of a train is unlawful—and necessarily it must mean that—it is a crime to organize a strike and call off conductors or trainmen. If it does not mean that, but simply means that physical force applied by an individual to stop the operation of a train is a criminal offense, we need no law, because it is a criminal offense throughout the United States under the law of every State in the Union. So on the one hand if it means one thing I do not think even the Senator himself would want to vote for it. If it means the other thing it is absolutely unnecessary because we have a law in every State affecting the subject matter.

Mr. REED. I wish to ask the Senator if it is not also true that it is the settled law wherever any violence is offered to stop a train that a writ of injunction is available to-day and always has been.

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly; and it is a criminal act in every State.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHILTON (when his name was called). Making the same announcement I did on the last vote, I vote "nay."

Mr. GALLINGER (when his name was called). Announcing the same transfer as on the last vote, I vote "yea."

Mr. GRONNA (when his name was called). Announcing the same transfer as on the former vote, I vote "nay."

Mr. HUGHES (when Mr. JAMES's name was called). I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES].

I desire also to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey]. Both Senators are detained on important business.

Mr. SHAFROTH (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER]. I can not get a transfer and I withhold my vote.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia (when his name was called). I announce my pair with the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], and withhold my vote.

Mr. STONE (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK]. Not being able to secure a transfer, I withhold my vote.

Mr. UNDERWOOD (when his name was called). Announcing the same transfer of my pair as on the vote a few minutes ago, I vote "yea."

Mr. WADSWORTH (when his name was called). Making the same announcement that I did before, I vote "nay."

Mr. WALSH (when his name was called). I transfer my pair as on the preceding vote, and vote "nay."

Mr. WEEKS (when his name was called). I make the same announcement of the transfer of my pair that I made before. I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. WEEKS. I wish to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. LODGE] and to have this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. DILLINGHAM (after having voted in the negative). I heard that the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH] did not vote. Am I correct?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. He did not.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I have a pair with that Senator, and withdraw my vote.

The result was announced—yeas 14, nays 52, as follows:

So Mr. NEWLANDS's amendment was rejected.

Mr. BRADY. Mr. President, I move to strike out section 4 of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Idaho moves to strike out section 4 of the bill.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. NORRIS. I offer the following amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nebraska offers an amendment, which the Secretary will report.

The SECRETARY. Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That beginning January 1, 1917, eight hours shall be deemed a day's work and the measure or standard of a day's work for the purpose of reckoning the compensation for services of all employees who are now or may hereafter be employed by any common carrier by railroad which is subject to the provisions of the act of February 4, 1887, entitled "An act to regulate commerce," as amended, and who are now or may hereafter be actually engaged in any capacity in the operation of trains used for the transportation of persons or property on railroads from any State or Territory of the United States or the District of Columbia to any other State or Territory of the United States or the District of Columbia, or from one place in a Territory to another place in the same Territory, or from any place in the United States to an adjacent foreign country, or from any place in the United States through a foreign country to any other place in the United States.

SEC. 2. From and after the passage of this act the Interstate Commerce Commission shall have the power to fix the rate of compensation and to make all necessary rules and regulations for the fixing of compensation, and for the payment and rate of overtime, and the conditions under which overtime may be allowed or permitted, of all of the employees of the railroads named in section 1 of this act. Said commission shall also fix the compensation of all of the officials of all of the common carriers by railroad which are subject to the provisions of the act of February 4, 1887, entitled "An act to regulate commerce," and of all amendatory acts thereto. Said commission may, either upon its own initiative or upon the hearing of any complaint filed by any official or officials of said roads, or any employee or organization of employees of any of said railroads, or by the Attorney General of the United States, or any citizen or organization of citizens of the United States, increase or reduce the salary of any of the officials of any of said roads, or increase or reduce the wages of any of said employees, or change or modify any of the rules and regulations relating to the hours of labor or the conditions of labor of any of said employees. All of the provisions of said act of February 4, 1887, entitled "An act to regulate commerce," or any of the amendatory acts thereto, in regard to orders and hearing provided for therein, shall apply, as far as applicable, to hearings under this act.

SEC. 3. That whenever said commission shall fix any salary of any official of any of said roads as provided for herein, or shall fix the wages and conditions of labor of any of said employees as provided for herein, said salary or wage shall be the salary or wage to be paid to said official or said employees by the said railroad companies, and shall remain as so fixed by said commission until the same is changed by said commission as herein provided, and no greater or less salary or wage shall be paid than the one so fixed by said commission.

SEC. 4. That any person representing any of said railroads violating any of the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be fined not less than $100 nor more than $1,000 or imprisoned not to exceed one year, or both.

SEC. 5. This act shall not apply to street or interurban railways operated by electricity.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I desire briefly to refer to what I have already explained at some length earlier in the day in regard to this proposed substitute.

To begin with, I believe that the same body to which we have given authority by law to fix rates of transportation for freight and passenger service ought to have complete authority to fix all of the items that go into the making up of those rates. Everybody knows that, as to the wages of the men and the salaries of the officers, which are often exorbitant, no commission or board has now the right to change them. It seems to me that the logical thing to do is to give to the Interstate Commerce Commission—that commission to which we have delegated the right, in a general way, to regulate all interstate railroads, to fix the rates, and to make them fair—the authority to fix the salaries of the railroad presidents and also the wages of all the men who work on the roads.

Suppose, Mr. President, such was the law now. Instead of having the country confronted with the condition which now confronts it, this is what would be the situation: The men who claim they ought to have higher wages would, in the regular way, have gone to the Interstate Commerce Commission and have filed their complaint, a hearing would be had, and judgment would be rendered. Why should not the same commission, to which I must go and to which you must go, Mr. President, if you complained about an unfair charge in a freight rate or a passenger rate or of some other regulation, determine these questions in the same way and render judgment in the same way?

It would mean, in my judgment, Mr. President, that the condition which confronts us now could never again arise. A strike such as we are now facing would not be, at least, a probability and would be almost an impossibility. It seems, therefore, that we ought to give to this commission, which is already clothed with partial authority—the commission to which we have given authority to place a physical valuation upon every one of these roads in order that they may more fully administer justice between the public and the men and the railroads as to rates—the power to fix the salaries of the officers and to fix the wages of the men.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair desires to make an announcement. If there be further amendments to be offered to the House bill, now is the time to offer them and to have them considered, for the proposition now presented by the Senator from Nebraska is to strike out the House bill and to insert an entirely new bill. Our rules provide that when that is the case the proposition to be stricken out is open to amendment. Then the proposition that is to take its place—if affirmative action of the Senate shall so authorize—shall be open to amendment.

The Chair makes this announcement for the reason that it gives him an opportunity to call attention to the mandatory language of our unanimous-consent agreement, that all amendments which are not disposed of by 6 o'clock will fail, because the requirements of the unanimous-consent agreement is that we proceed to vote upon the final passage of the House bill not later than 6 o'clock.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, under that ruling of the Chair, I submit an amendment to the original bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Louisiana submits an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend section 1 of the bill, on page 2, by striking out, in line 19, the words "or between railroads and industrial plants" and to insert in lieu thereof the words "or between railroads known as belt-line railroads and industrial plants."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, I am not going to insist on the adoption of this amendment, unless the bill is amended in some other particulars. Personally I think it wise that we shall accept the bill as it came to the Senate from the other House; but, if this bill is to be amended, I think the amendment which I have suggested should be made in order to make plain certain language which is now very ambiguous. That is all I wish to say.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Louisiana.

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Are there further amendments to the House bill? [A pause.]

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I offer the amendment which I send to the Secretary's desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed, at the end of line 23, on page 3, after the word "workday," to insert the following:

Provided, That nothing in this act contained shall be held to amend, alter, or repeal an act entitled "An act to promote the safety of employees and travelers upon railroads by limiting the hours of service of employees thereof," approved March 4, 1907: And provided further, That nothing in this act contained shall be held to amend, alter, or repeal an act approved May 4, 1916, entitled "An act to amend section 3 of an act entitled 'An act to promote the safety of employees and travelers upon railroads by limiting the hours of service of employees thereof.'"

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, the first act referred to in the proposed amendment is an act adopted in 1907 limiting the hours of continuous service for men operating trains to 16 hours. The second act referred to is an amendment of that act, simply changing the penalty clause.

My reason for offering the amendment is that by section 3 of the proposed act now pending before the Senate, in line 20, it is proposed that the operatives of railway trains may be required, by arrangement with the roads, to run in addition to eight hours, the number of hours necessary in excess of eight hours to conduct the business according to the views of the railroad.

I greatly fear, Mr. President, that that provision will be construed as amending the act limiting the period of continuous service to 16 hours, and the amendment of that act which refers only to the penalty clause. I think it would be very much against the interests of the public, Mr. President, if it should be held under that provision that between the owners of the railroads and the operatives of trains there could be an arrangement by which the operatives of trains might be continued in service during all the hours necessary in the view of the owners of the road to conduct the business of the road. If that construction should be put upon this law, it would amend and modify and repeal the limitation of 16 hours of continuous service fixed by the act of 1907.

Mr. President, that would be a very serious thing. It would be very detrimental to the public interest. That act was passed in the interest of safety to the traveling public. It provided that men operating trains should not be required to run them for more than 16 continuous hours. If the provisions of section 3 of this act allow, as I construe them to allow, the extension of that time to such length as may be necessary in the view of the railroads and the men for the operation of trains beyond 16 hours, it would then, Mr. President, enable the railroads to require the operatives of trains to run such length of time as to endanger the safety of the traveling public.

No harm can possibly occur from the adoption of this amendment. It only provides that this bill shall not be so construed as to extend the time of continuous service in the operation of trains by arrangement between the operatives and the railroads beyond the limitation fixed in the 16-hour bill and the modification of that bill made by the present Congress.

I sincerely hope, sir, that this amendment may be adopted; and I beg to say to the Senate that no agreement to vote upon this bill at 6 o'clock to-day would ever have been accepted in this body if, as suggested by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], we would not be permitted to offer amendments here to the House bill which might be considered upon their merits.

Mr. President, the Senate is an independent body. It is the one body of Congress in which we can have deliberative action. The only way in which we are deprived of that is by a unanimous-consent agreement. I acceded to that unanimous-consent agreement at 10 or 11 o'clock last night in the belief that any amendment which had merit in it might be considered upon its merit by this body, and that we should not be foreclosed from offering important amendments to this measure by any such condition as that suggested by the Senator from Missouri earlier in our deliberations, after we reached the hour of 4 o'clock, when he said that the House was without a quorum and that we must abdicate our functions as a legislative body and accept the bill as it passed that body. I would never last night have consented to fixing a time to vote upon this bill, sir, if it had not been my belief that any amendment proposed to this legislation could receive careful and deliberate consideration of this body.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. LEWIS and Mr. WILLIAMS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois has been recognized. Does he yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. LEWIS. I will say to the Senator from Mississippi that I merely desire to address myself, as a member of the committee, to the observations of the Senator from Wisconsin. Has the Senator from Mississippi some matter of urgency for which he would like me to give way?

Mr. WILLIAMS. No; I merely wanted to dwell upon the same subject; that is all.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, there need be no fear on the part of the able Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] of such operation of this law as is indicated by his observations. When this measure was before the committee there were a couple of members of the committee who suggested that there might be such likelihood or such thought from some sources; but all finally concurred in the principle of law which we recognized that repeals by implication are never favored by the courts. The courts could not indulge in the assumption that we implied the repeal of the other sections or the other laws upon a different or mere cognate subject matter. There is no affirmative expression in this proposed law repealing any other law. The courts would look to the law for such expression and the absence of it would of itself be instruction that no such repeal was intended.

Again, sir, the subject matter of the 16-hour law relating to continuous service upon the railroads is one thing. The designation in this law of eight hours per day for general service in general matters is another. Therefore, there can not arise the implication feared by the able Senator.

But, sir, if there were any fears to be expressed hereafter by him, or realized when we meet in December, if the able Senator then should feel that it was necessary to add some specific provision which would meet any doubts whatever even in his mind, there would be time enough to do it; since this law we are about to enact is not going into effect until January, 1917. To place the amendment upon the law now, merely on a fear or conjecture, would burden it unnecessarily and, I assure the able Senator, would be without defense or necessity. We respectfully insist it bears no relation whatever to the repeal feared by the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I think the object which in borne in view by the Senator from Wisconsin is rather an important one. I think it ought to be accomplished in some way.

This bill provides that the basic day shall be a day of eight hours. It also provides that for overtime the men shall be paid proportionately. Undoubtedly that does leave open the question as to whether or not a man could be worked 16 hours or 18 hours or 20 hours; but the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin, in the form in which he now has it, is entirely wrong. It goes on to say that nothing in this act shall be taken as repealing any part of the act of 1907, or subsequent and supplementary laws.

If that amendment is agreed to it renders the legislation which we are now passing nugatory, because the very nature of the case establishes the fact that we do repeal certain parts of those acts. We repeal that part of the act fixing 16 hours as a basic day and nothing else; and when an amendment is offered saying that nothing in this act "shall be so construed" as to repeal anything in that act that is going too far. The Senator could put in his amendment right after the part of the bill which provides that for overtime that the workmen shall be paid pro rata, something like this, "but that nobody shall be worked over 16 hours," and that would accomplish his purpose; but he has covered too much territory in the amendment as he has written it.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I am reluctant to interrupt under the five-minute rule.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator is at liberty to interrupt the Senator from Mississippi as much as pleases that Senator.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The amendment made by this Congress to the 16-hour law was an amendment to the penalty provision. There is nothing in the 16-hour law excepting a limitation on the hours of labor and the enforcement of that limitation by penalty; but the penalty provision of the act of 1907 was found to be inoperative, and the present Congress cured that by an amendment which related simply to the penalty. I will not take the time of the Senate to state that, but that is all there is of it; and the reference to those two acts relates simply to the 16-hour limitation and the penalty provision attached to it. If that can be saved, we will save the violation of that law.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I am very sorry that I cannot agree with the Senator in his construction of his amendment. This act reads:

> And for all necessary time in excess of eight hours such employees shall be paid at a rate not less than the pro rata rate for such standard eight-hour workday.

Now, I see perfectly how under that provision a railroad could work a man 20 hours, paying him only for excess time pro rata; but it seems to me that if the Senator, after the word "workday," should strike out the period and insert a comma, and then add the language, "Provided, however, That no employee engaged in interstate commerce shall be compelled to work," or "shall be called on to work," or "shall be permitted to contract to work over 16 hours," he would then save the point he has in view.

The Senator is right in this——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have only five minutes.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I know, but——

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator is right in this—that the present law was passed for the purposes of public safety. It was thought that men who worked over 16 hours were not fully possessed of their faculties, physical or mental, so as to conserve the public safety. I have every sympathy with the object which the Senator has in view; but, as John Allen said when we took over the Philippines, his amendment simply covers too much territory.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will admonish Senators that all amendments not voted on by 6 o'clock will fail for want of time to consider them.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I rise to speak on the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS]. Now, in the latitude given in debate here, I just want to reply to this criticism of my amendment, in a few words.

The Senator from Mississippi does not know that the railroads have avoided the operation of the law of 1907.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will say to the Senator from Wisconsin that the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska is not technically before the Senate.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Well, I am not speaking on it technically. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Then the Senator is not in order. The Senator will be good enough to take his seat. Under the rules, the Chair can not enlarge the unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President, I simply want to call the attention of the Senate to the language of the 16-hour law, which provides—

> That it shall be unlawful for any common carrier, its officers or agents, subject to this act, to require or permit any employee subject to this act to be or remain on duty for a longer period than 16 consecutive hours.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for just a second?

Mr. HUGHES. Certainly.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Under that law, the violations by the railroad companies, because of the inadequate penalty, were nearly 500,000 in number in the last year.

Mr. HUGHES. I understand that.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The present Congress enacted an amendment which provided that for any violation they should pay a fine of not less than $100 nor more than $500. The former law was weak in the respect that it provided no minimum penalty, and many courts assessed the railroads only 1 cent for a violation of the law. The violations under the original act were very numerous, and the violations will continue unless you preserve both of the statutes that you have to-day.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President, we have preserved both of the statutes. Of course, we have preserved the 16-hour law. There is nothing in this legislation that proposes its repeal. The penalty clause has been amended, as suggested by the Senator from Wisconsin, and it is in full force and effect. The proposed legislation simply provides that in the event of any employee working more than eight hours he shall be paid as though he had worked a full day and pro rata wages for the time he works over that day.

It seems to me that the Senator from Wisconsin will be only unnecessarily jeopardizing this legislation. I do not know whether he is in favor of it or not; but, if he is, it seems to me he will be only jeopardizing the legislation by insisting on his amendment, and will not be in any way aiding or helping in the enforcement of the 16-hour law.

Mr. BRADY. Mr. President, every Senator in this Chamber knows that the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] is fair and equitable and should be adopted. It puts a positive construction upon this bill, and one that there could be no mistake about; and yet it will not be adopted for the reasons I stated in my former remarks.

I pause to say that I had in mind this very subject when I introduced my amendment to strike out section 4. I did not discuss it for the reason that I have always thought that he who laughs last laughs best; and when you come to enforce this law, when you come to put it in operation, I warn you that you will find that you will have some obstacles to overcome that you can not overcome. Under this bill the railroad companies are permitted to work the men 16 hours a day. You are putting a burden upon the employees that they can not, and in my judgment should not and will not, bear. You are enacting this legislation at this time for the purpose of preventing a strike. You are simply breeding a greater strike than you are preventing to-day. I shall vote against this bill because I believe it is a bill passed for political expediency and not for the benefit of the railroads or of the public or of the laboring men of this Nation.

This bill says that the men shall have a standard day's wages based on a day of eight hours, and that they shall be paid pro rata for overtime. If a man works 16 hours under this bill and is receiving 50 cents an hour he earns $4 for the eight hours and pro rata for overtime, which means that he will receive 50 cents an hour for overtime. Under existing contracts between the railroad companies and employees the men receive time and a half for overtime, and under a 50-cents-an-hour contract the men would receive 75 cents an hour. In other words, under existing contracts the men would receive $6 for overtime, whereas under this bill they will only receive pro rata for overtime, which would mean $4 for the eight hours overtime, and the passage of this bill will cause every member of the brotherhood to lose $2 on every eight hours of overtime they work during the next 10 months after this bill becomes a law. You must remember that the railroads are operated for a profit, and that they have a perfect right under this law to require men to work for at least 16 hours, and, in my judgment, more than 16 hours, but with the adoption of the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], which I favor, we can at least limit the time to 16 hours, and we must expect that the railroad companies, as a matter of business, will operate the full number of hours permitted under the law wherever it is convenient to do it in efficient operation, and we should understand and realize that, although we raise the wages of these employees 20 per cent, instead of shortening their hours of labor to an eight-hour day as an average labor day for the train operators for the next 10 months they will be lengthened, and when this occurs the laboring men of this Nation—these very members of the brotherhood that are here to-day—will protest, and they will protest justly, if the hours of labor are unreasonably lengthened on a pro rata basis when they have worked for years to secure time and a half for overtime. They have at this time a legal right to protest and to strike to protect their rights if their demands are not granted, and you are to-day taking this right away from them. As has been said in this Chamber to-day, not only by Members on this side, but by Members on the majority side, everything that has been gained by the laboring men in the last 20 years has been gained by organization and by dealing directly with the companies.

You are taking that right away from them to-day and you are going to compel them to work, where they receive 50 cents an hour, for eight long hours of overtime for the sum of $4, while they are to-day throwing away their right to receive, not something in the future, but something that they are receiving at this very hour and I do not believe when they understand it they will submit to it, and if they do not submit to it what are you going to do to them? Section 4, the section I moved to strike out and which amendment the majority so jokingly voted down, says "that any person violating any provision of this act shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction shall be fined not less than $100 and not more than $1,000, or imprisoned not to exceed one year, or both." I say to the majority that you are taking away from the laboring men the liberty they have to-day, and you are placing them in a position of involuntary servitude for the next 10 months, and it is impossible for them to have any relief whatever without paying a fine or going to jail, or both. I am opposed to this bill and shall vote against it, because I believe it is not enacted in good faith, or for the public good. I favor the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin, and I challenge any member of the majority to rise in his seat now and say that amendment is not fair and just, or to say that it should not be adopted by this body. I further challenge any member of the majority to rise in his seat and say that he will vote for this amendment or any other amendment that is offered to this bill, or that he will vote to change the doting of an i or the crossing of a t in this bill. You will not do it, although you know in your hearts that this amendment ought to be adopted. We have been wasting time. You intended to pass this bill in its present form when it came over from the House. We might as well have voted for it yesterday as to-day.

I yield to no man in my desire to further the cause of labor in securing an eight-hour day, but I refuse to be a party to the enactment of a law that pretends to give a certain class of men an eight-hour day but which in reality takes away from them every vested right that they have worked so many years to secure. I want to pass a law that is just as favorable to the stockholders and bondholders of the railroad companies as it is to the laboring men. You have not done justice to the investor in this bill. You have been absolutely unfair to the employees, and the public has not been taken into consideration at all.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the Senator occupies the floor for five minutes, all these amendments will fail.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I wish to state——

Mr. NORRIS. Will not the Senator let us vote on the pending amendment?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I wish to state that the subject of the effect of this action upon the 16-hour law was considered by the committee and that they were of the opinion that there was nothing whatever in this act to affect that law or the act amendatory of it.

Now, I wish to say another thing. The time for debate is about to close and I have not the opportunity I desired of making the closing remarks. I should like leave, therefore, to insert in the RECORD a statement from myself appearing in an interview in the New York Times regarding the railroad controversy. The interview was had prior to the President's message upon this subject, though it was printed afterwards.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Such will be the order unless there is objection.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[From the New York Times, Sunday, Aug. 27, 1916.]

PROBLEM OF THE RAILROADS—CHAIRMAN OF THE SENATE COMMITTEE ON INTERSTATE COMMERCE WARNS AGAINST FEDERAL OWNERSHIP.

"Almost as a matter of instinct I believe in the eight-hour day for railroad employees and all other classes of labor in the United States. I do not believe in Government ownership of the railroads in this country so long as Government regulation is adequate, and it has not yet been proved inadequate. I believe that the attitude of the railway investor is a big factor that we can not ignore. I believe that if it is necessary for the railroads to increase their rates in order to meet the added cost of an eight-hour day they should be allowed to do so. I am not in favor of compulsory arbitration, for that, of course, means, if it means anything, compulsory abiding by the award of the arbitrators which, in turn, means involuntary servitude in the United States."

These isolated sentences were uttered by Senator FRANCIS G. NEWLANDS, of Nevada, in the course of an interview at Washington the other day when he was asked why the Newlands Act providing for the the settlement of railroad disputes by mediation or arbitration had failed to meet the emergency of the present controversy between the railroad companies and their employees.

They may be taken as the railroad creed of the Senator whose name is associated with the most advanced piece of labor legislation so far enacted by the Federal Government, and who is the ranking man in Congress in transportation matters, because of his chairmanship of the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce. Another vital article of that creed is the Senator's belief that all railroads should be brought under closer national control and more efficient r gulation by national incorporation.

As to the refusal of the railroad employees to arbitrate in 1916 under the terms of the Newlands Act, which they indorsed with so much enthusiasm at the time of it: passage in 1913, their refusal being based on their claim that they do not get a square deal, Senator Newlands said that the men were not afraid of partiality on th part of the arbitrators, but of the arbitrators' lack of expert knowledge of the many complicated questions involved.

"The objection of the railroad brotherhoods," he said, "is not so much to the law as to the lack of information at the disposal of the umpires. No matter how just and fair they ma, be, they are inexpert. They are not clear in their own understanding of the issues and they can not be clear in their decisions. After the award is made it becomes necessary to explain too much, possibly to arbitrate the award itself. This is what the men complain of, and, I think, explains their refusal to arbitrate at the present time.

"They declare, for example, that the granting of their demands would cost the roads only twenty millions more a year for operating. The roads declare that it would cost much more than that. There should be some way of putting such an important point as that before the arbitrators as an undisputed fact to enable them to decide it on its merits, not in the form of two widely divergent guesses about the same thing. And that is only one of the many things concerning which we need accurate knowledge.

"Another illustration is in the matter of wages now paid throughout the railroad industry. It is asserted that the average pay of the railroad employees who are not organized is only about $700 a year, while the average pay of the workers who are organized, something less than one-third of the whole, is from $1,100 to $1,200 a year. Are we getting to the point where the lower strata of the labor in this industry of transportation should be built up? Are we giving too much consideration to the demands of what we may call the aristocracy of labor and not enough to the unorganized? Nobody knows, but we ought to know. We need the facts to determine these things.

"I recently introduced in the Senate a resolution directing the Interstate Commerce Commission to ascertain as soon as possible the minimum, maximum, and average wages paid with hours of service, to every class of railroad employee in the United States, to compare them with wages of other industries in which similar skill and risk are involved, to determine the relation of railroad wages to railroad revenues, and to consider whether railroad revenues, based on existing rates, would admit of equally favorable terms to all classes of railroad employees. There was a second section to the resolution declaring it to be the sense of Congress that the railroads and their employees should assist in the gathering of this information, and that meanwhile they should defer their present controversy over hours and wages. I offered this resolution tentatively, at the request of the national chamber of commerce, without going into the merits of it, but I am convinced that some such method of getting all the facts is absolutely essential to the adequate settlement of our railroad labor troubles.

"The resolution was tabled for various reasons. One was that we are having a national campaign. The railroad employees themselves were opposed to it because it would mean delay. I hardly think we can blame them for not wanting delay now that they have got their campaign for eight hours and more pay under way. It requires a tremendous effort to start such a movement as theirs from the beginning, and they object to losing the momentum they have worked up and beginning all over again. A moving body is going to get to its goal much more quickly than one that is halted to get more facts.

"But the eight-hour day, which I believe in instinctively for all labor when it can be brought about in an orderly manner, is not a goal to be driven at to reach in a day regardless of the welfare of the country as a whole. So why not agree upon a modus vivendi until we can get the facts that we need for the fair determination of the real questions?

"Of course the modus vivendi would itself be a matter of arbitration, but the award would be temporary. For example, why not an agreement now on a nine-hour day with time-and-a-quarter pay for overtime, such an agreement to run for one year or two years? In the meantime we would get together the information that any board of arbitration must have to reach an intelligent conclusion.

"If we could find some way to prevent by law radical action in the way of strike or lockout until the Government could ascertain all the facts and instruct public opinion, it would be worth while.

"We not only want to know what the men need, but what the roads are able to pay without impairing their service to the public. As between money that goes to favored stockholders by manipulation and money that is paid to employees in increased wages, I much prefer the latter, but there must be fair dividends. The welfare of the entire country demands that, for the railway investor is one of the chief contributors to that welfare. Without him we can have no further development of the country's chief industry, the industry upon which all our other industries depend. If ability to pay dividends is found to depend on authority to increase rates to meet the increasing cost of labor and supplies and taxes, as it is bound to be, then by all means let the roads increase the rates.

"To decrease dividends to the vanishing point, thereby cutting off all new capital, means Government ownership, and we ought not to approach Government ownership in this country until Government regulation has failed. It is now so far from being a failure that the United States has to-day the best system of railroads in the world, with the best wages for employees and the best service to the public and by far the cheapest service in proportion to its quality.

"I would prefer wage increases and shorter hours and rate increases to pay the bigger bills to Government ownership, but I have no prejudices against such ownership. I realize that the world is drifting toward it. The European countries have it. England is practically running her own roads. But why should we change so long as our roads are better, better for all concerned, under the United States system of regulation than the Government-owned foreign systems are? If this country ever does come to Government ownership we surely do not want to be forced to it by a cataclysm of industrial war. It must come, if at all, through the orderly process of evolution, which means the perfection of regulation first.

"If the Government should take over the roads the interest it would have to pay on the money borrowed for the purpose probably would be less than the dividends now paid to stockholders, but I doubt very much if the service would be as economic and efficient as it is now, and it is difficult to estimate the effect it would have on the country to have more than a million voters added to the pay roll of Government employees.

"To come back to the present, I see no way for the settlement of our labor disputes except by mediation, and if that fails, by arbitration, and we already have sufficient law for that purpose, if it is supplemented by some governmental device for getting the needed facts. I refer, of course, to voluntary arbitration. At the time the present mediation act was under discussion, preliminary to its passage, there was some talk of providing compulsory arbitration. That talk has been revived in the course of the controversy now pending. But the United States ought not to have compulsory arbitration, if it means, in its logical outcome, involuntary servitude. There would be no point in compelling the opponents to arbitrate, whether or no, unless you could compel them later on to abide by the award of the arbitrators and, in the case of the men, make it obligatory for them to remain at work.

"On the other hand, if you admit the principle that they can all give up their jobs at once and combine to prevent others from taking their places, that means that there is always the possibility of paralysis of the entire country. It means the possibility of civil war. A strike of the dimensions of the one now threatened would be civil war. It is idle to ignore the fact that such a strike could not be won without force and that the strikers would use force. And there would be nothing left for the public but to use force, too, in the shape of the military and every other agency at the disposal of the Government to offset violence and keep the roads in operation. It seems barbarous and uncivilized, but civilization has not yet devised any other way. It will find a way eventually and there is no need for discouragement. Reason and persuasion go much further than they used to in these matters. When we have learned how, they will go all the way in every contingency.

"In the meantime there might be for this country, if it would adopt it, a policy much better than Federal ownership, and that is Federal incorporation of the railroads. Such incorporation would unify and simplify the railroad administration of the country as a whole. It would recognize the evolution of the transportation industry under which the operation and management of almost the entire mileage has come under the control of a very few well-known groups or systems. By such incorporation and control the taxes of railroads could be made fixed and certain. That would also be true of dividends, so that hereafter any increase of business would tend mathematically, either to a betterment of the road to an increase in wages, or to a diminution in rates.

"I would require that all railroads engaging in interstate commerce should incorporate under a national law in accordance with certain conditions, not only permitting but favoring the consolidation of railroads. I would provide that the amount of stocks and bonds issued for such a consolidation should be approved by the Interstate Commerce Commission and that they should not exceed the actual value of the roads consolidated, as determined by the commission. I would provide that the commission should approve the amount of bonds and stocks to be issued for the purchase of connecting or intersecting lines, for the betterment of existing roads, and the construction of new ones. I would make a rigid requirement to the effect that these securities should not exceed the value of the property acquired, or the actual cost of the work of construction. This would effectually prevent future overcapitalization.

"The fact is that the railroad, whether in the hands of the Government or a private corporation, is a natural monopoly. The steady trend of consolidation is the outcome of economic forces which can not be controlled or appreciably impeded by legislation. Our present railroad system, even though it is the best in the world, is needlessly complicated and expensive, involving the maintenance of many unnecessary corporations. There should be unity of ownership, recognized by the law, of such railroads as are now linked together in interstate commerce, regardless of State boundaries. As State legislation can not accomplish this, the railroad corporations should be national—the creation of the Government whose jurisdiction is as broad as interstate commerce itself."

PRESIDENTIAL NOTIFICATION (S. DOC. NO. 543).

Mr. FLETCHER. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD and as a Senate document the address delivered to-day by Senator OLLIE M. JAMES, notifying President Wilson of his nomination for President by the Democratic Party and the reply of the President accepting the nomination.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HUGHES in the chair). Is there objection?

Mr. PENROSE. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Pennsylvania objects.

Mr. FLETCHER. I wish to state that the same request was preferred by Mr. MANN in the House regarding the address of Senator HARDING and the reply of Mr. Hughes, and it was granted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania insist on his objection?

Mr. PENROSE. No; I did not understand the request, owing to the confusion in the Chamber.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request?

Mr. SMOOT. Just a moment. Do I understand the Senator to say that the address delivered by Senator HARDING and the response by Gov. Hughes at the notification meeting in New York were printed both in the RECORD and as a public document?

Mr. FLETCHER. Precisely; on August 2, page 11992 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, which I have before me. It says:

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the speeches which have just been authorized to be inserted in the RECORD, of Senator HARDING and Mr. Hughes, may be also printed as a House document, so that they will be in a more convenient form.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the speeches of Senator HARDING and Mr. Hughes be published as a House document. Is there objection?

There was no objection (H. Doc. No. 1315).

Mr. SMOOT. I am not going to object to this request; but I want to say to the Senator that if that request had not been granted in the House I certainly would have objected to the addresses being printed both in the RECORD and as a public document.

Mr. FLETCHER. I know the Senator's usual objection, and I would not have made the request except for this precedent to do both.

Mr. SMOOT. I would not have consented to have them printed both in the RECORD and as a document.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The matter referred to is as follows:

ADDRESS OF HON. OLLIE M. JAMES.

Mr. President, the Democracy of the Republic assembled in national convention at St. Louis, Mo., June 14, 1916, was genuinely representative of the true spirit of America—its ideals of justice and of patriotism.

These representatives of the purest democracy in the world, after three and a half years of trial of your service to the people of the country, with a Nation to choose from to fill the greatest office in the world, instinctively and enthusiastically turned to you. By this they not only registered their own will and desire, but also the will and wish of the people back home, whose trusted and honored spokesmen they were. With an enthusiasm, unanimity, and earnestness never surpassed in the political life of America, they have summoned you again to lead the hosts of peace, prosperity, and American righteousness.

They do not make this call upon you for the purpose of honoring you, for you have already had bestowed upon you by your countrymen the greatest honor within their gift. They call you for service to America and mankind; a service you have so amply proved to be of the highest type known to just governments among men; a service that has given justice to all men upon free and equal terms; a service that has restored taxation to its historic and constitutional function; a service that has freed trade to individual and honest endeavor; a service that has lifted from the tables and homes of the plain people of America a burden of taxation which they have unjustly borne for more than a half century and placed it upon the wealth and fortunes of the land; a service that has driven monopoly from its rendezvous of taxation; a service that has denied to the trusts of Republican creation a hiding place in our economic life; a service to the toilers of America that lifted them from the despised level of a commodity to the high plane of a human unit in our industrial life; a service that has dignified them—the great army of workers of the field, factory, and mine; a service that opened the courts to all men upon equal terms of justice and constitutional liberty; a service that freed the money of a nation from the control of a "money oligarchy" and lodged it in the hands of the Government; a service that at once destroyed two trusts, a Money Trust and a Panic Trust, where the business can not be oppressed or destroyed by manipulation of the money market, nor legislation controlled, intimidated, or suppressed by the Panic Trust. These two trusts that your service and matchless leadership destroyed live only in memory, as contemporary with the malodorous rule of the boss-ridden and monopoly-controlled stand-pat Republican Party.

It is a service which has prepared the Nation for its defense; a service to fair and equal treatment to all men by destroying a subsidy fed to an American monopoly; a service to the farmers of our country who yearn for a home and fireside to call their own by enacting into law a Federal rural-credits system that makes credit and home building easy to the tillers of the soil; a service that in the stormiest hours of America's life and the bloodiest days of the life of the world, you have kept our people at peace with all the earth; a service that has kept homes happy, family circles unbroken, while the Old World staggers beneath its weight of sorrow, mourning, and death; a service whose victories for the freedom of the seas, the rights of neutral life, the protection of American citizens and American rights stands resplendent in the world's international law and in the earth's diplomacy. This great triumph which you achieved for America and the world gave protection to noncombatants and neutrals that war-mad countries must respect, and this diplomatic achievement will be the guiding, protecting precedent to millions of lives of the innocent and unoffending long after you are gone. This triumph of yours will not be told in history by a great war debt, a mammoth pension roll, vacant chairs at unhappy firesides, and Decoration Day services to place flowers upon the mounds of those who achieved it, but it will be told in the victory of matchless diplomacy and of irresistible logic, presenting in an unequaled manner the everlasting principle of justice.

Under your unrivaled and fearless leadership you have rescued the little children of America—the future fathers and mothers of our race—from the grinding slavery of the sweatshop and the factory. No dividends or fortunes in the future will bear the stain of their toil and tears; their youthful days will be spent in the fresh air of growing life and in the schoolrooms of the land, where they will be properly prepared in strength and mind to become the future citizens of a great, humane, and free Republic.

You behold your country after three and a half years of your administration more prosperous than ever in its history. The earning of the laborers of America exceed by $3,000,000,000 their earnings under four years of the administration of your predecessor; the savings of the people deposited in the banks of our country amout to $6,000,000,000 more than was deposited under the four years of the administration of Mr. Taft.

Our exports for the first time in our history lead the world; our farmers are more prosperous than ever; business is free; individual endeavor is no longer denied its reward. The increase in the business of the commercial world is so great that it almost staggers the mind to contemplate it, notwithstanding a world's war has called for legislation to stay the process of the courts in debt collections in all the neutral countries of the world except here, where plenty blesses and prospers our people. Your beloved country marches forward to a prosperity never dreamed of. Your opponents are unwillingly forced to admit this happy condition of our people, which they say is not permanent, but they shall be no more regarded as prophets now than they were when they said it could not come.

Four years ago in accepting the nomination of the Democratic Party for the Presidency you stated that you would seek advice and counsel wherever you could obtain it upon free terms; this you have done. You uncovered and drove a mighty lobby out of the Capitol and invited Americans of all stations to come and counsel with you. The laborer with his grimy hand, the farmer with the tan of the blazing sun upon his face; the railroad men who hold the throttle, swing the lantern, and direct the rolling wheels of commerce; the toiler from the damp and darkness of mine, from the shop, the mill, and the factory; the business men from their offices, the clerk from the counter, the banker, the artisan, the lawyer, and the doctor, have come and found welcome and shared counsel with you. They knew you were free to serve, that you were unbossed, unowned, and unafraid. They knew you only sought the truth, and when you found it you were ready to challenge all of its adversaries to any conflict.

When peace shall spread her white wings over a charred and bloody world, in the quiet of the chamber of the just historian, when the din and roar of political antagonism shall have ceased, when the prejudice and passion of partisanship shall have died away, when principle shall actuate men and parties rather than appetite, when ambition shall no longer lure men and parties to unjust attack, the historian will accord to you and your administration a foremost place in the Republic's life.

Americans are not ungrateful; the people are not unpatriotic; they recognize the thousands of difficulties that no man could foresee which you have encountered and mastered. Their verdict is already written; it has been agreed upon at the firesides of the land and has been molded in the schoolhouses, the places of worship, and wherever Americans meet to talk over the affairs and good of their country. That verdict leaps forth from almost every American heart in undying gratitude to you for the service you have rendered, for the peace, prosperity, and happiness your leadership has given, and I but voice this day the overwhelming wish of Americans everywhere for your triumphant reelection.

This great convention which nominated you was neither controlled nor intimidated by any un-American or foreign influence. It had the heart beat and spoke the true sentiment of our country.

A committee composed of the permanent chairman of the convention and one delegate from each State and Territory was appointed to inform you of your selection as the nominee of the Democratic Party for President of the United States and to request you to accept it, and the convention did me the honor to make me chairman of this committee charged with such a happy mission.

Therefore, in compliance with the command of that convention, this committee performs that pleasing duty, and, as the appointed agent of that great national Democratic convention, I hand you this formal letter of notification, signed by the members of the committee, accompanied by a copy of the platform adopted by the convention, and upon that platform I have the honor to request your acceptance of the tendered nomination. And, on behalf of the Democrats of the whole Republic, who are proud of your great administration, we pledge you their enthusiastic and united support, and our prayer is that God, who blesses the peacemaker, may guide you to a glorious victory in November.

SPEECH OF ACCEPTANCE, 1916.

Senator JAMES, gentlemen of the notification committee, fellow citizens, I can not accept the leadership and responsibility which the national Democratic convention has again, in such generous fashion, asked me to accept without first expressing my profound gratitude to the party for the trust it reposes in me after four years of fiery trial in the midst of affairs of unprecedented difficulty, and the keen sense of added responsibility with which this honor fills—I had almost said burdens—me as I think of the great issues of national life and policy involved in the present and immediate future conduct of our Government. I shall seek, as I have always sought, to justify the extraordinary confidence thus reposed in me by striving to purge my heart and purpose of every personal and of every misleading party motive and devoting every energy I have to the service of the Nation as a whole, praying that I may continue to have the counsel and support of all forward-looking men at every turn of the difficult business.

For I do not doubt that the people of the United States will wish the Democratic Party to continue in control of the Government. They are not in the habit of rejecting those who have actually served them for those who are making doubtful and conjectural promises of service. Least of all are they likely to substitute those who promised to render them particular services and proved false to that promise for those who have actually rendered those very services.

Boasting is always an empty business, which pleases nobody but the boaster, and I have no disposition to boast of what the Democratic Party has accomplished. It has merely done its duty. It has merely fulfilled its explicit promises. But there can be no violation of good taste in calling attention to the manner in which those promises have been carried out or in adverting to the interesting fact that many of the things accomplished were what the opposition party had again and again promised to do but had left undone. Indeed that is manifestly part of the business of this year of reckoning and assessment. There is no means of judging the future except by assessing the past. Constructive action must be weighed against destructive comment and reaction. The Democrats either have or have not understood the varied interests of the country. The test is contained in the record.

What is that record? What were the Democrats called into power to do? What things had long waited to be done, and how did the Democrats do them? It is a record of extraordinary length and variety, rich in elements of many kinds, but consistent in principle throughout and susceptible of brief recital.

The Republican Party was put out of power because of failure, practical failure and moral failure; because it had served special interests and not the country at large; because, under the leadership of its preferred and established guides, of those who still make its choices, it had lost touch with the thoughts and the needs of the Nation and was living in a past age and under a fixed illusion, the illusion of greatness. It had framed tariff laws based upon a fear of foreign trade, a fundamental doubt as to American skill, enterprise, and capacity, and a very tender regard for the profitable privileges of those who had gained control of domestic markets and domestic credits; and yet had enacted antitrust laws which hampered the very things they meant to foster, which were stiff and inelastic, and in part unintelligible. It had permitted the country throughout the long period of its control to stagger from one financial crisis to another under the operation of a national banking law of its own framing which made stringency and panic certain and the control of the larger business operations of the country by the bankers of a few reserve centers inevitable; had made as if it meant to reform the law, but had faint-heartedly failed in the attempt, because it could not bring itself to do the one thing necessary to make the reform genuine and effectual, namely, break up the control of small groups of bankers. It had been oblivious or indifferent to the fact that the farmers, upon whom the country depends for its food and in the last analysis for its prosperity, were without standing in the matter of commercial credit, without the protection of standards in their market transactions, and without systematic knowledge of the markets themselves; that the laborers of the country, the great army of men who man the industries it was professing to father and promote, carried their labor as a mere commodity to market, were subject to restraint by novel and drastic process in the courts, were without assurance of compensation for industrial accidents, without Federal assistance in accommodating labor disputes, and without national aid or advice in finding the places and the industries in which their labor was most needed. The country had no national system of road construction and development. Little intelligent attention was paid to the Army, and not enough to the Navy. The other Republics of America distrusted us, because they found that we thought first of the profits of American investors and only as an afterthought of impartial justice and helpful friendship. Its policy was provincial in all things; its purposes were out of harmony with the temper and purpose of the people and the timely development of the Nation's interests.

So things stood when the Democratic Party came into power. How do they stand now? Alike in the domestic field and in the wide field of the commerce of the world, American business and life and industry have been set free to move as they never moved before.

The tariff has been revised, not on the principle of repelling foreign trade but upon the principle of encouraging it, upon something like a footing of equality with our own in respect of the terms of competition, and a Tariff Board has been created whose function it will be to keep the relations of American with foreign business and industry under constant observation, for the guidance alike of our business men and of our Congress. American energies are now directed toward the markets of the world.

The laws against trusts have been clarified by definition, with a view to making it plain that they were not directed against big business but only against unfair business and the pretense of competition where there was none; and a Trade Commission has been created with powers of guidance and accommodation which have relieved business men of unfounded fears and set them upon the road of hopeful and confident enterprise.

By the Federal reserve act the supply of currency at the disposal of active business has been rendered elastic, taking its volume not from a fixed body of investment securities, but from the liquid assets of daily trade; and these assets are assessed and accepted not by distant groups of bankers in control of unavailable reserves, but by bankers at the many centers of local exchange who are in touch with local conditions everywhere.

Effective measures have been taken for the re-creation of an American merchant marine and the revival of the American carrying trade indispensable to our emancipation from the control which foreigners have so long exercised over the opportunities, the routes, and the methods of our commerce with other countries.

The Interstate Commerce Commission has been reorganized to enable it to perform its great and important functions more promptly and more efficiently. We have created, extended, and improved the service of the parcel post.

So much we have done for business. What other party has understood the task so well or executed it so intelligently and energetically? What other party has attempted it at all? The Republican leaders, apparently, know of no means of assisting business but "protection." How to stimulate it and put it upon a new footing of energy and enterprise they have not suggested.

For the farmers of the country we have virtually created commercial credit, by means of the Federal reserve act and the rural-credits act. They now have the standing of other business men in the money market. We have successfully regulated speculation in "futures" and established standards in the marketing of grains. By an intelligent warehouse act we have assisted to make the standard crops available as never before, both for systematic marketing and as a security for loans from the banks. We have greatly added to the work of neighborhood demonstration on the farm itself of improved methods of cultivation, and, through the intelligent extension of the functions of the Department of Agriculture, have made it possible for the farmer to learn systematically where his best markets are and how to get at them.

The workingmen of America have been given a veritable emancipation by the legal recognition of a man's labor as part of his life, and not a mere marketable commodity; by exempting labor organizations from processes of the courts, which treated their members like fractional parts of mobs and not like accessible and responsible individuals; by releasing our seamen from involuntary servitude; by making adequate provision for compensation for industrial accidents; by providing suitable machinery for mediation and conciliation in industrial disputes; and by putting the Federal Department of Labor at the disposal of the workingman when in search of work.

We have effected the emancipation of the children of the country by releasing them from hurtful labor. We have instituted a system of national aid in the building of highroads such as the country has been feeling after for a century. We have sought to equalize taxation by means of an equitable income tax. We have taken the steps that ought to have been taken at the outset to open up the resources of Alaska. We have provided for national defense upon a scale never before seriously proposed upon the responsibility of an entire political party. We have driven the tariff lobby from cover and obliged it to substitute solid argument for private influence.

This extraordinary recital must sound like a platform, a list of sanguine promises; but it is not. It is a record of promises made four years ago and now actually redeemed in constructive legislation.

These things must profoundly disturb the thoughts and confound the plans of those who have made themselves believe that the Democratic Party neither understood nor was ready to assist the business of the country in the great enterprises which it is its evident and inevitable destiny to undertake and carry through. The breaking up of the lobby must especially disconcert them; for it was through the lobby that they sought and were sure they had found the heart of things. The game of privilege can be played successfully by no other means.

This record must equally astonish those who feared that the Democratic Party had not opened its heart to comprehend the demands of social justice. We have in four years come very near to carrying out the platform of the Progressive Party as well as our own; for we also are progressives.

There is one circumstance connected with this programme which ought to be very plainly stated. It was resisted at every step by the interests which the Republican Party had catered to and fostered at the expense of the country, and these same interests are now earnestly praying for a reaction which will save their privileges—for the restoration of their sworn friends to power before it is too late to recover what they have lost. They fought with particular desperation and infinite resourcefulness the reform of the banking and currency system, knowing that to be the citadel of their control; and most anxiously are they hoping and planning for the amendment of the Federal reserve act by the concentration of control in a single bank which the old familiar group of bankers can keep under their eye and direction. But while the "big men" who used to write the tariffs and command the assistance of the Treasury have been hostile—all but a few with vision—the average business man knows that he has been delivered, and that the fear that was once every day in his heart, that the men who controlled credit and directed enterprise from the committee rooms of Congress would crush him, is there no more, and will not return, unless the party that consulted only the "big men" should return to power—the party of masterly inactivity and cunning resourcefulness in standing pat to resist change.

The Republican Party is just the party that can not meet the new conditions of a new age. It does not know the way and it does not wish new conditions. It tried to break away from the old leaders and could not. They still select its candidates and dictate its policy, still resist change, still hanker after the old conditions, still know no methods of encouraging business but the old methods. When it changes its leaders and its purposes and brings its ideas up to date, it will have the right to ask the American people to give it power again; but not until then. A new age, an age of revolutionary change, needs new purposes and new ideas.

In foreign affairs we have been guided by principles clearly conceived and consistently lived up to. Perhaps they have not been fully comprehended because they have hitherto governed international affairs only in theory, not in practice. They are simple, obvious, easily stated, and fundamental to American ideals.

We have been neutral not only because it was the fixed and traditional policy of the United States to stand aloof from the politics of Europe and because we had had no part either of action or of policy in the influences which brought on the present war, but also because it was manifestly our duty to prevent, if it were possible, the indefinite extension of the fires of hate and desolation kindled by that terrible conflict and seek to serve mankind by reserving our strength and our resources for the anxious and difficult days of restoration and healing which must follow, when peace will have to build its house anew.

The rights of our own citizens of course became involved; that was inevitable. Where they did this was our guiding principle: that property rights can be vindicated by claims for damages when the war is over, and no modern nation can decline to arbitrate such claims; but the fundamental rights of humanity can not be. The loss of life is irreparable. Neither can direct violations of a nation's sovereignty await vindication in suits for damages. The nation that violates these essential rights must expect to be checked and called to account by direct challenge and resistance. It at once makes the quarrel in part our own. These are plain principles, and we have never lost sight of them or departed from them, whatever the stress or the perplexity of circumstance or the provocation to hasty resentment. The record is clear and consistent throughout and stands distinct and definite for anyone to judge who wishes to know the truth about it.

The seas were not broad enough to keep the infection of the conflict out of our own politics. The passions and intrigues of certain active groups and combinations of men amongst us who were born under foreign flags injected the poison of disloyalty into our own most critical affairs, laid violent hands upon many of our industries, and subjected us to the shame of divisions of sentiment and purpose in which America was contemned and forgotten. It is part of the business of this year of reckoning and settlement to speak plainly and act with unmistakable purpose in rebuke of these things, in order that they may be forever hereafter impossible. I am the candidate of a party, but I am above all things else an American citizen. I neither seek the favor nor fear the displeasure of that small alien element amongst us which puts loyalty to any foreign power before loyalty to the United States.

While Europe was at war our own continent, one of our own neighbors, was shaken by revolution. In that matter, too, principle was plain and it was imperative that we should live up to it if we were to deserve the trust of any real partisan of the right as free men see it. We have professed to believe, and we do believe, that the people of small and weak states have the right to expect to be dealt with exactly as the people of big and powerful states would be. We have acted upon that principle in dealing with the people of Mexico.

Our recent pursuit of bandits into Mexican territory was no violation of that principle. We ventured to enter Mexican territory only because there were no military forces in Mexico that could protect our border from hostile attack and our own people from violence, and we have committed there no single act of hostility or interference even with the sovereign authority of the Republic of Mexico herself. It was a plain case of the violation of our own sovereignty which could not wait to be vindicated by damages and for which there was no other remedy. The authorities of Mexico were powerless to prevent it.

Many serious wrongs against the property, many irreparable wrongs against the persons, of Americans have been committed within the territory of Mexico herself during this confused revolution, wrongs which could not be effectually checked so long as there was no constituted power in Mexico which was in a position to check them. We could not act directly in that matter ourselves without denying Mexicans the right to any revolution at all which disturbed us and making the emancipation of her own people await our own interest and convenience.

For it is their emancipation that they are seeking—blindly, it may be, and as yet ineffectually, but with profound and passionate purpose and within their unquestionable right, apply what true American principle you will—any principle that an American would publicly avow. The people of Mexico have not been suffered to own their own country or direct their own institutions. Outsiders, men out of other nations and with interests too often alien to their own, have dictated what their privileges and opportunities should be and who should control their land, their lives, and their resources—some of them Americans, pressing for things they could never have got in their own country. The Mexican people are entitled to attempt their liberty from such influences; and so long as I have anything to do with the action of our great Government I shall do everything in my power to prevent anyone standing in their way. I know that this is hard for some persons to understand; but it is not hard for the plain people of the United States to understand. It is hard doctrine only for those who wish to get something for themselves out of Mexico. There are men, and noble women, too, not a few, of our own people, thank God! whose fortunes are invested in great properties in Mexico who yet see the case with true vision and assess its issues with true American feeling. The rest can be left for the present out of the reckoning until this enslaved people has had its day of struggle toward the light. I have heard no one who was free from such influences propose interference by the United States with the internal affairs of Mexico. Certainly no friend of the Mexican people has proposed it.

The people of the United States are capable of great sympathies and a noble pity in dealing with problems of this kind. As their spokesman and representative, I have tried to act in the spirit they would wish me show. The people of Mexico are striving for the rights that are fundamental to life and happiness—15,000,000 oppressed men, overburdened women, and pitiful children in virtual bondage in their own home of fertile lands and inexhaustible treasure! Some of the leaders of the revolution may often have been mistaken and violent and selfish, but the revolution itself was inevitable and is right. The unspeakable Huerta betrayed the very comrades he served, traitorously overthrew the government of which he was a trusted part, impudently spoke for the very forces that had driven his people to the rebellion, with which he had pretended to sympathize. The men who overcame him and drove him out represent at least the fierce passion of reconstruction which lies at the very heart of liberty; and so long as they represent, however imperfectly, such a struggle for deliverance, I am ready to serve their ends when I can. So long as the power of recognition rests with me the Government of the United States will refuse to extend the hand of welcome to anyone who obtains power in a sister republic by treachery and violence. No permanency can be given the affairs of any republic by a title based upon intrigue and assassination. I declared that to be the policy of this administration within three weeks after I assumed the Presidency. I here again vow it. I am more interested in the fortunes of oppressed men and pitiful women and children than in any property rights whatever. Mistakes I have no doubt made in this perplexing business, but not in purpose or object.

More is involved than the immediate destinies of Mexico and the relations of the United States with a distressed and distracted people. All America looks on. Test is now being made of us whether we be sincere lovers of popular liberty or not and are indeed to be trusted to respect national sovereignty among our weaker neighbors. We have undertaken these many years to play big brother to the republics of this hemisphere. This is the day of our test, whether we mean, or have ever meant, to play that part for our own benefit wholly or also for theirs. Upon the outcome of that test—its outcome in their minds, not in ours—depends every relationship of the United States with Latin America, whether in politics or in commerce and enterprise. These are great issues and lie at the heart of the gravest tasks of the future, tasks both economic and political, and very intimately inwrought with many of the most vital of the new issues of the politics of the world. The republics of America have in the last three years been drawing together in a new spirit of accommodation, mutual understanding, and cordial cooperation. Much of the politics of the world in the years to come will depend upon their relationships with one another. It is a barren and provincial statesmanship that loses sight of such things!

The future, the immediate future, will bring us squarely face to face with many great and exacting problems which will search us through and through whether we be able and ready to play the part in the world that we mean to play. It will not bring us into their presence slowly, gently, with ceremonious introduction, but suddenly and at once, the moment the war in Europe is over. They will be new problems, most of them; many will be old problems in a new setting and with new elements which we have never dealt with or reckoned the force and meaning of before. They will require for their solution new thinking, fresh courage and resourcefulness, and in some matters radical reconsiderations of policy. We must be ready to mobilize our resources alike of brains and of materials.

It is not a future to be afraid of. It is, rather, a future to stimulate and excite us to the display of the best powers that are in us. We may enter it with confidence when we are sure that we understand it—and we have provided ourselves already with the means of understanding it.

Look first at what it will be necessary that the nations of the world should do to make the days to come tolerable and fit to live and work in; and then look at our part in what is to follow and our own duty of preparation. For we must be prepared both in resources and in policy.

There must be a just and settled peace, and we here in America must contribute the full force of our enthusiasm and of our authority as a Nation to the organization of that peace upon world-wide foundations that can not easily be shaken. No nation should be forced to take sides in any quarrel in which its own honor and integrity and the fortunes of its own people are not involved; but no nation can any longer remain neutral as against any willful disturbance of the peace of the world. The effects of war can no longer be confined to the areas of battle. No nation stands wholly apart in interest when the life and interests of all nations are thrown into confusion and peril. If hopeful and generous enterprise is to be renewed, if the healing and helpful arts of life are indeed to be revived when peace comes again, a new atmosphere of justice and friendship must be generated by means the world has never tried before. The nations of the world must unite in joint guaranties that whatever is done to disturb the whole world's life must first be tested in the court of the whole world's opinion before it is attempted.

These are the new foundations the world must build for itself, and we must play our part in the reconstruction, generously and without too much thought of our separate interests. We must make ourselves ready to play it intelligently, vigorously, and well.

One of the contributions we must make to the world's peace is this: We must see to it that the people in our insular possessions are treated in their own lands as we would treat them here, and make the rule of the United States mean the same thing everywhere—the same justice, the same consideration for the essential rights of men.

Besides contributing our ungrudging moral and practical support to the establishment of peace throughout the world, we must actively and intelligently prepare ourselves to do our full service in the trade and industry which are to sustain and develop the life of the nations in the days to come.

We have already been provident in this great matter and supplied ourselves with the instrumentalities of prompt adjustment. We have created, in the Federal Trade Commission, a means of inquiry and of accommodation in the field of commerce which ought both to coordinate the enterprises of our traders and manufacturers and to remove the barriers of misunderstanding and of a too technical interpretation of the law. In the new Tariff Commission we have added another instrumentality of observation and adjustment which promises to be immediately serviceable. The Trade Commission substitutes counsel and accommodation for the harsher processes of legal restraint, and the Tariff Commission ought to substitute facts for prejudices and theories. Our exporters have for some time had the advantage of working in the new light thrown upon foreign markets and opportunities of trade by the intelligent inquiries and activities of the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce which the Democratic Congress so wisely created in 1912. The Tariff Commission completes the machinery by which we shall be enabled to open up our legislative policy to the facts as they develop.

We can no longer indulge our traditional provincialism. We are to play a leading part in the world drama whether we wish it or not. We shall lend, not borrow; act for ourselves, not imitate or follow; organize and initiate, not peep about merely to see where we may get in.

We have already formulated and agreed upon a policy of law which will explicitly remove the ban now supposed to rest upon cooperation amongst our exporters in seeking and securing their proper place in the markets of the world. The field will be free, the instrumentalities at hand. It will only remain for the masters of enterprise amongst us to act in energetic concert, and for the Government of the United States to insist upon the maintenance throughout the world of those conditions of fairness and of even-handed justice in the commercial dealings of the nations with one another upon which, after all, in the last analysis, the peace and ordered life of the world must ultimately depend.

At home also we must see to it that the men who plan and develop and direct our business enterprises shall enjoy definite and settled conditions of law, a policy accommodated to the freest progress. We have set the just and necessary limits. We have put all kinds of unfair competition under the ban and penalty of the law. We have barred monopoly. These fatal and ugly things being excluded, we must now quicken action and facilitate enterprise by every just means within our choice. There will be peace in the business world, and, with peace, revived confidence and life.

We ought both to husband and to develop our natural resources, our mines, our forests, our water power. I wish we could have made more progress than we have made in this vital matter; and I call once more, with the deepest earnestness and solicitude, upon the advocates of a careful and provident conservation, on the one hand, and the advocates of a free and inviting field for private capital, on the other, to get together in a spirit of genuine accommodation and agreement and set this great policy forward at once.

We must hearten and quicken the spirit and efficiency of labor throughout our whole industrial system by everywhere and in all occupations doing justice to the laborer, not only by paying a living wage but also by making all the conditions that surround labor what they ought to be. And we must do more than justice. We must safeguard life and promote health and safety in every occupation in which they are threatened or imperiled. That is more than justice, and better, because it is humanity and economy.

We must coordinate the railway systems of the country for national use, and must facilitate and promote their development with a view to that coordination and to their better adaptation as a whole to the life and trade and defense of the Nation. The life and industry of the country can be free and unhampered only if these arteries are open, efficient, and complete.

Thus shall we stand ready to meet the future as circumstance and international policy effect their unfolding, whether the changes come slowly or come fast and without preface.

I have not spoken explicitly, gentlemen, of the platform adopted at St. Louis; but it has been implicit in all that I have said. I have sought to interpret its spirit and meaning. The people of the United States do not need to be assured now that that platform is a definite pledge, a practical program. We have proved to them that our promises are made to be kept.

We hold very definite ideals. We believe that the energy and initiative of our people have been too narrowly coached and superintended; that they should be set free, as we have set them free, to disperse themselves throughout the Nation; that they should not be concentrated in the hands of a few powerful guides and guardians, as our opponents have again and again, in effect if not in purpose, sought to concentrate them. We believe, moreover—who that looks about him now with comprehending eye can fail to believe—that the day of little Americanism, with its narrow horizons, when methods of "protection" and industrial nursing were the chief study of our provincial statesmen, are past and gone and that a day of enterprise has at last dawned for the United States whose field is the wide world.

We hope to see the stimulus of that new day draw all America, the Republics of both continents, on to a new life and energy and initiative in the great affairs of peace. We are Americans for big America, and rejoice to look forward to the days in which America shall strive to stir the world without irritating it or drawing it on to new antagonisms, when the nations with which we deal shall at last come to see upon what deep foundations of humanity and justice our passion for peace rests, and when all mankind shall look upon our great people with a new sentiment of admiration, friendly rivalry, and real affection, as upon a people who, though keen to succeed, seeks always to be at once generous and just and to whom humanity is dearer than profit or selfish power.

Upon this record and in the faith of this purpose we go to the country.

GENERAL DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 17645, the deficiency appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 17645) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916, and prior fiscal years, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Appropriations with amendments.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I ask that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with, that the bill be read for amendment, and that the committee amendments be first considered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill. The first amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 1, after line 8, to insert:

The proper disbursing officer of the Federal Trade Commission is authorized and directed to pay George Rublee, from available appropriations, the compensation authorized to be paid to a commissioner in the Federal Trade Commission for the period covered by his service as such commissioner from the time of his entry on duty on March 16, 1915, to May 15, 1916, the date when his nomination by the President to such position was rejected by the Senate, notwithstanding section 1761 of the Revised Statutes of the United States to the contrary.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, this is a matter familiar to us all. Mr. Rublee has served under a recess appointment, and he could not receive compensation under the statute. I do not object to this amendment, as I think he ought to be compensated, but I want to suggest that if the attempt is made to keep Mr. Rublee in that office by further recess appointments, there will be more trouble in getting appropriations of this kind in the future than there is to-day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, can we not have order? It is impossible to hear what is going on.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Senators will please be seated and cease conversation.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Bureau of Efficiency," on page 3 after line 8, to insert:

Until otherwise provided by law the Bureau of Efficiency shall continue to occupy its present quarters in the Winder Building.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed and continued to the end of the following clause on page 3:

Payment to Republic of Nicaragua: To enable the Secretary of State to pay, for the benefit of the Republic of Nicaragua, in accordance with article 3 of the treaty between the Government of the United States and the Government of Nicaragua, signed August 5, 1914, $3,000,000.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, if I may detain the Senate for just a moment in regard to this matter. I want, first, to ask of the chairman of the committee in charge of the bill a question. I assume by his calling up the bill at this time that he desires to pass it this afternoon.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. That is my special wish, in order that we may bring this session to a close as soon as possible.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I certainly do not desire to postpone the program, or rather the adjournment according to the program, as indicated by the Senator from Virginia. There is, however, an item in this bill which has just been read, to wit, $3,000,000 to meet the obligations arising out of what is known as the Nicaraguan treaty. The treaty has been ratified by this Government, and ordinarily it would seem to be utterly useless and without point to urge an objection against an appropriation to meet the obligations incurred by a treaty.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills:

H. R. 15158. An act to amend the Judicial Code; to fix the time when the annual term of the Supreme Court shall commence; and further to define the jurisdiction of that court; and

H. R. 17700. An act to establish an eight-hour day for employees of carriers engaged in interstate and foreign commerce, and for other purposes.

Mr. PENROSE. Let us have order, Mr. President.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Can we not have order, Mr. President?

Mr. PENROSE. If we can not have order, I intend to raise the question of no quorum and move to adjourn.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I hope the Senator will not do that. We will finish this bill in 20 minutes.

Mr. PENROSE. If the Chair can maintain order, I will not do so.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I am sure order will be restored in a few moments. There is naturally some confusion.

Mr. PENROSE. Although the request has been made order has not been restored, and the worst disorder is around the Chair.

Mr. BORAH. From appearances it is difficult to tell whether this is a caucus in session or whether it is the Senate.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. It is only a conference.

Mr. PENROSE. It seems to be a Democratic conference.

DESIGNATION OF PRESIDING OFFICER.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate a communication from the President pro tempore, which will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

UNITED STATES SENATE,
Washington, D. C.

To the Senate:

The Vice President being absent from the Senate, and the undersigned being also necessarily absent therefrom, he, as President pro tempore of the Senate, hereby names the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES] to perform the duties of the Chair on the 2d day of September, 1916; this substitution not to extend beyond an adjournment.

JAMES P. CLARKE,
President pro tempore of the Senate.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I should like to inquire whether the bill we passed a few moments ago has been signed?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Signed by whom?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. By the Presiding Officer.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Of this body?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Yes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It has been signed.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. By the present occupant of the chair?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. By the present occupant of the chair.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Before the communication conferring the authority on the present occupant of the chair was read to the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair does not recognize the right of the Senator to cross-examine the occupant of the chair. The Senator will find everything in order.

Mr. PENROSE. The Chair is obligated to announce the signature of bills.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair announces the signature of the Chair——

Mr. PENROSE. Here is a signature that has evidently been put on the bill before the official appointment of the Presiding Officer was announced to the Senate, in the midst of the greatest confusion that has prevailed at this session in the Chamber, and without any effort to control it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair, as acting President of the Senate pro tempore, announces his signature to the enrolled bill (H. R. 17700) to establish an eight-hour day for employees of carriers engaged in interstate and foreign commerce, and for other purposes.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, of course I am not familiar with what has been going on about the Chair. The circle of Senators standing about it has prevented any knowledge permeating to the floor. I should think a grave question was raised as to the validity of the signature of the bill if the authority of the Chair to preside at this time was not announced before the bill was signed.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, we should like to know over on this side what the Senator is saying.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, as I understand, the President pro tempore of the Senate has placed the Senator from New Jersey in the chair and has designated him to discharge his functions, and one of the functions is to sign bills. Pursuant to that direction, which is put upon the record, the Senator from New Jersey, now the Presiding Officer of the Senate, has signed this bill. If there is any objection that can be urged against that now, I should like to hear it.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, I should just like to say to the Senate that the act has been performed. The bill has been signed. It is an ended chapter, and I hope the Senate will now let us proceed to consider the measure that is before the Senate. I ask for the regular order.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I assume that debate on this bill is in order, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Of course the Senator from Virginia has the floor.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. All that I did was to appeal to Senators to maintain order and let the consideration of this bill proceed; that was all.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Why, Mr. President, I want to maintain order, and I was under the impression that the Senator from Idaho had the floor and was debating the amendment that had been read.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. That is all; and I am simply asking that he be allowed to proceed.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Pending that, the Chair had read to the Senate a document purporting to give authority to him to preside over the Senate, and I took the liberty of asking the question whether he had signed the eight-hour railroad labor bill before he had exhibited his credentials to preside over the Senate. But whether or not it is legal is not for me to say. I know nothing about it. It will be a matter for the courts to determine, I assume.

Mr. LANE. Mr. President, the temporary President of the Senate signed it after he read that.

Mr. PENROSE. He has said he signed it before.

Mr. LANE. Well, he made certain of it by signing it afterward also.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Pennsylvania is mistaken. The Chair did not state that he signed it before. The Chair will state now that he signed it afterward.

Mr. PENROSE. Since the Senator from Oregon says the Chair signed it twice, I may be mistaken, on account of the disorder. Of course, if he has signed it twice, it is doubly secure.

Mr. LANE. And the temporary President has a right to sign it twice.

Mr. PENROSE. I have no doubt the Presiding Officer can keep on signing it all the evening. [Laughter.]

Mr. KERN. I ask unanimous consent that the order heretofore made fixing 6.30 o'clock as the hour for adjournment be suspended for the day.

Mr. PENROSE. I must object to that, Mr. President. We have had a long day. I do not want to delay the public business, of course.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I want to appeal to the Senator from Pennsylvania to withdraw his objection. I am sure we can finish the general deficiency bill in 20 or 30 minutes, and I hope he will let us go on and complete it.

Mr. PENROSE. Very well; I will withdraw the objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Indiana? The Chair hears none.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. PENROSE. Now, Mr. President, I hope we can have order around the Chair and less conversation. I suggest that the Sergeant at Arms enforce order in the neighborhood of the Chair.

GENERAL DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATIONS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 17645) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916, and prior fiscal years, and for other purposes.

Mr. BORAH. This mental relaxation after the day's strain is very agreeable.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask for order. The Senator from Idaho is addressing the Senate, or wants to address the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will be in order. The Senator from Idaho is recognized.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I was referring to the item in the bill of $3,000,000 for the purpose of meeting an obligation created on the part of the Government by reason of what is known as the Nicaraguan treaty.

As is known to the Senate, that treaty has been ratified by this Government. It has, in form, been ratified by the Nicaraguan Government. I opposed the ratification of the treaty by this Government, and it had been my purpose to speak at length with reference to this appropriation. I am aware, of course, that if there is a treaty to which we ought to give our faith and observance we ought to make the appropriation, and ordinarily I would not think of taking up the time of the Senate to discuss an appropriation under a treaty.

I feel absolutely certain in my own mind, first, that the treaty has never been ratified by a Nicaraguan Government; secondly, that when a Nicaraguan government comes into existence it will repudiate the treaty which has been made ostensibly or apparently with this Government. I believe, in the first place, as I said, that there has been no action upon the part of any Government which can be really called a government upon the part of Nicaragua. Whatever government there was there in form was one maintained by our military forces, and the treaty was ratified under the direction and control of those military forces. We made a treaty with ourselves.

It seems to me, therefore, that I am acting within reason and proper principles when I oppose this appropriation; but here is the situation: The Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN] desires to proceed with this measure this afternoon. It is utterly impossible for me to present the matter this afternoon. It is now 6 o'clock, and but few Senators present.

I do not myself desire, I will say, to prolong this session if it is within the purview of those in charge of the situation to end the session; but I do want to give notice that at the first opportunity I shall present this matter as I understand it to be in its entirety. It will perhaps have just as much effect in the long run as if I should present it now, because I have no idea that my presentation would prevent the making of the appropriation. But this matter is now in litigation in Central America. The Government of Costa Rica, and others interested, have brought the matter into what is known as the supreme court of Central America and are there litigating it. As I understand, the Nicaraguan Government has been restrained, or its officers have been restrained, from proceeding in any way to receive the money. Before that matter shall have been determined this money certainly will not be paid over to the Nicaraguan Government by our Government; and I am, therefore, about to say that I will not detain the Senate in what would be a wholly incomplete presentation of it this evening. If the bill goes over so that I will have an opportunity to present the matter at a later day, I will do so; but I will not ask for myself that the bill be postponed.

I think, however, this is a much more serious matter than the Senate has contemplated it to be. There is not a Central American country whose press has not condemned and denounced this transaction. I have a very complete press report in regard to it from the Central American countries, and it has been almost universally, if not universally, condemned by the press of Central America. It is looked upon in Central America as a military encroachment upon a small, uninfluential government and taking advantage of a situation to close a contract of tremendous import and benefit to this Government.

Mr. CLAPP. If the Senator will pardon an interruption, it would be far from my purpose to delay the session of Congress or to ask a question that would seem to be a criticism of the Senator from Idaho. I assume that he is in possession of facts not generally known, at least not known to myself. Here is a proposition to vote away $3,000,000, and the Senator feels that it is not right to let this matter go unchallenged. If he is in the possession of facts which he feels should ultimately be made in the form of an argument to the Senate, I would not say that I would feel differently about it from what the Senator does.

Mr. BORAH. I recognize the implied criticism of the Senator, and I think it is well founded in a sense. I realized when making my statement that I am putting myself in a position for that criticism. But I want to say in response to the Senator that these matters were pretty well presented to the Senate in executive session. We went over the matter pretty thoroughly. The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE] presented it in a very thorough way, and I expressed some views of my own, but the treaty, notwithstanding the presentation of those facts, was ratified.

Mr. CLAPP. Was it a fact that this Government had been enjoined in any court of Central America at that time?

Mr. BORAH. That is a fact which has arisen since the treaty was ratified with this Government, but that is rather to the advantage of my proposition, because I have no idea there will be anything like a close of the transaction under those circumstances for some time to come.

Mr. CLAPP. As the case stands the money will have to be voted.

Mr. BORAH. I am not authorized to state this, but I have reason to believe that our Government is not going to let loose of this money, although appropriated under the treaty, until that litigation is settled.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. If that is true, what is the use of appropriating it in this bill? Why would not December be plenty of time?

Mr. BORAH. I suggested that proposition to the other side of the Chamber and also to the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, but there seems to be good reason for them to go ahead with the bill. I am not going to ask for a delay of the bill, in view of the two-thirds vote which was had on the ratification of the treaty; but I do feel profoundly that we are doing wrong or I would not have fought this through two administrations. This treaty, and what I may call the infamy of it, began under the former administration. This administration took it up and has followed out the program which was initiated in force and fraud and in the killing of a great many citizens of Nicaragua. Therefore it is in no sense, and could not possibly be, a partisan matter. But the Senate knows almost as much about it as I do, and with this statement I shall reserve my discussion of it until some other time.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, I will not occupy the time of the Senate for more than three minutes. The plain statement of the case is that the treaty has been ratified and that it created an international obligation on this Government to pay to Nicaragua $3,000,000. Since that has been done, some legal proceedings have been commenced, which are having the careful scrutiny of the State Department, and they will not pay this money until there is a fixed and final obligation to do it. Indeed there seems to be a fixed obligation now, but the legal proceedings attending the case are having the careful consideration of the State Department.

The Secretary of State said he is exceedingly anxious to have the money appropriated now, though he will not pay it out until it can properly and safely be paid; but he contemplated that that hour will arrive very soon, and asked Congress to put this money at his disposal so that he may meet the obligation.

I am sure that no harm will be done; that no risk will be taken; that every right and every interest of the United States will be carefully protected. I feel and the committee felt that it was incumbent upon us, and I think it is incumbent upon Congress, to put the money at his disposal, to be paid out as he thinks it ought to be paid. I hope the Senate will take that course.

The reading of the bill was continued.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Treasury Department," on page 5, after line 19, to insert:

The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to refund to the J. L. da Roza Estate (Inc.), of Elk Grove, Cal., the sum of $1,158, which is hereby appropriated in accordance with private act No. 83, approved August 7, 1916, being the internal-revenue taxes paid on 20 barrels of grape brandy destroyed by fire on the evening of November 18, 1911, and while stored in the designated place of deposit on the distillery premises in the custody of an officer of internal revenue and before being stamped with special bonded warehouse stamps permitting removal to bonded warehouse.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was continued to line 3, page 7.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I simply want to call the attention of the Senate to this appropriation of an additional $100,000 for the Federal Farm Loan Board. When the Senate passed the original bill as I understood it it was distinctly understood that the appropriations contained therein would be sufficient. Here now within a few weeks we have another $100,000 coming out of the Public Treasury for the Farm Loan Board.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. The estimate was for $300,000. We gave one-third. That was for the purpose of organizing the service. It was the least possible sum they could proceed with in the beginning. We gave just one-third of the amount estimated for.

Mr. PENROSE. I do not criticize so much the amount, as to which I am not advised, but I should like to have the attention of the chairman of the committee if I can with the disorder prevailing. What I do criticize is this slipshod way of doing business. Why was not the whole amount of the appropriation made when the original farm-loan bill was passed?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Because it would not have been proper to make an appropriation for a service that had not been created. We simply made an appropriation to organize the commission created by the bill. The commission was appointed. I do not think it would have been any kind of a business procedure to have made an appropriation of a larger amount until after the commission was organized and ready for business. We simply give them $200,000 altogether where they asked for $300,000.

Mr. PENROSE. The point I make is this: How can we justify the appropriation of $100,000 originally? Why did we not disclose the full program to the American people and appropriate the $200,000 that was thought to be necessary? Why this surreptitious method of legislation, passing a bill and giving out the idea that the Farm Loan Board was only to cost $100,000, and then bring in another $100,000 in this deficiency bill? Why was not the appropriation made in the original bill? Why was it left to a subsequent date? But that is neither here nor there. I simply want to call attention to the methods that have been adopted for the last three years in what, in my opinion, is a wasteful expenditure, not properly estimated and not contemplated when the original program was inaugurated.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Public buildings," on page 7, after line 4, to insert:

Chicago (Ill.) post office, courthouse, etc.: For the removal of the present roof covering of the dome and the substitution therefor of a new copper-covered roof, $20,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 7, after line 18, to insert:

Bureau of Engraving and Printing: For miscellaneous repairs to laundry, new roof, etc., damaged by fire, for the fiscal year 1917, $20,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 7, after line 21, to insert:

For repairs to laundry machinery damaged by fire, fiscal year 1917, $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Internal revenue," on page 8, after line 14, to insert:

Salaries and expenses of collectors of internal revenue: For salaries and expenses of collectors of internal revenue, deputy collectors, surveyors, clerks, messengers, and janitor in internal-revenue offices, $200,000, being additional to the amount of $2,465,000 provided by the act approved May 10, 1916, making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and for other purposes, $200,000.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I should like to ask the chairman of the committee why this appropriation is necessary?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. It is intended to meet the new expenses created by the pending revenue bill.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, that justifies further criticism as to the complicated method of making these appropriations. Only a few days ago on the revenue bill section 47 was adopted, reading as follows:

SEC. 47. For the expense connected with the assessment and collection of the taxes provided by this act there is hereby appropriated $100,000, or so much thereof as may be required, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue is authorized to appoint and fix the compensation of such officers, clerks, messengers, janitors, and other necessary employees in the enforcement of the provisions of this act for duty in the District of Columbia, or in any collection district of the United States, or any of the Territories thereof.

When I called attention to this paragraph a day or so ago it was expressly stated by the Senator having the bill in charge that that was the total amount required to carry into effect the provisions of the revenue bill now pending; and here we have smuggled into the deficiency bill an additional large appropriation of $200,000.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. This item was regularly estimated for by the officers of the Revenue Department, who appeared before the committee and satisfied us that it was absolutely necessary to have this amount of money to carry on the business of that department.

Mr. PENROSE. Then I desire to ask the Senator why $100,000 is tucked away in the revenue bill and $200,000 hid away in this bill, both of them having the same end in view? The Senator having charge of the revenue bill a few days ago declared on the floor of the Senate that my contention that a hundred places were going to be created in one internal-revenue district in California was an unjustifiable contention, because $100,000 was all the money that was needed. It now appears that $300,000 are needed. Let the country know that fact. Do not let them be deceived by having a statement made in connection with the revenue bill that the amount required to carry out that provision was only $100,000, and then have hidden away in this intricate and complicated bill upward of $200,000, absolutely contradicting and rendering absurd the statements made here several days ago in connection with the revenue bill.

Then, Mr. President, on page 10, I find an appropriation of $340,000 provided for in the House text, for additional expenses for collecting taxes, for "collecting the tax on legacies, munitions, copper, and so forth." Therefore we have $640,000 as the amount necessary to collect these new taxes; and the junior Senator from California deliberately stated to this body in response to certain objections of mine, that only $100,000 was to be applied to the collection of these new taxes under the new revenue law. Let the American people know that in the revenue bill there is $100,000, in the House text of this bill a provision for $340,000 additional, and an amendment reported by the Senate committee proposing to appropriate another $200,000 for the purpose of collecting the new taxes.

Mr. PHELAN. The Senator is not quite fair. I made no such statement. I think the statement was made by another Senator.

Mr. PENROSE. Well, probably it was made by some other Senator. I thought the Senator from California had called attention to the fact that it would be impossible to create all these additional places for "deserving Democrats," because the appropriation was limited to $100,000.

Mr. PHELAN. I heard that statement made, but I did not make it.

Mr. PENROSE. Very well. So we have a sum approximating $1,000,000, or crawling up toward that figure, instead of the humble $100,000 in the revenue bill. I maintain that that is not a straightforward, candid method of legislation in connection with that subject.

I will ask the Senator from Virginia, Mr. President, whether the word "copper," at the top of page 10, ought not to be stricken out? I do not understand that any tax is to be placed on copper under the revenue bill.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. That is the way the estimate came; and I see no need of striking it out.

Mr. PENROSE. Does the Senator understand that there is any tax left in the revenue bill on copper?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I do not know whether there will be or not.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will suggest that the bill has to go to conference in any event.

Mr. PENROSE. Yes; but that provision will not be in conference unless it is amended.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. If no tax on copper is provided in the revenue bill, the provision will amount to nothing. The item as it appears in the bill is the way the estimate was made and sent here.

Mr. PENROSE. It is ridiculous, Mr. President, to appropriate $340,000 to collect a tax upon a commodity on which no tax is imposed. It seems to make this whole transaction ridiculous. I move to amend, at the top of page 10, in line 3, by striking out the word "copper," so that the matter may go to conference.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. It will not have the slightest particle of effect. So I am perfectly willing that the word "copper" shall be stricken out. The provision will be quite as effective. "Copper" is mentioned along with other commodities, ending with the words "and so forth." So I am perfectly willing that the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania shall be adopted striking out the word "copper," if that will be any satisfaction to him.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 10, line 3, it is proposed to strike out the word "copper" and the comma following it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, when the amendment now under consideration was before the committee, I reserved the right to offer an amendment to it, which I will now submit; and I trust the chairman will not object to it, but will let it go to conference.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In the committee amendment on page 8, line 24, it is proposed to amend by adding the following:

Provided, That all clerks, messengers, and janitors to be appointed under this provision shall be selected——

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, I hope the Senator will hold his amendment until the unanimous-consent order is accomplished, that committee amendments shall be first disposed of.

Mr. GALLINGER. This is a committee amendment we are considering.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. It does not make any difference as to that. When we get through with the committee amendments it will be in order for the Senator to offer his amendment.

Mr. GALLINGER. Under the rules of the Senate it would not be in order until the bill reached the Senate.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Very well. To save time, let the amendment be offered now, although it is absolutely out of order. I am sorry that any member of the committee should want to embarrass us in this way. However, let us proceed.

Mr. GALLINGER. I do not concede that it is out of order at all. It is an amendment to a committee amendment.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Well, let it proceed. I am perfectly willing, in order to save time, that the amendment shall be presented and acted upon by the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 8, line 24, at the end of the committee amendment, it is proposed to add:

Provided, That all clerks, messengers, and janitors to be appointed under this provision shall be selected from the eligible lists of the Civil Service Commission and in accordance with the provisions of the civil-service law.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I have no objection to the amendment going in the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on agreeing to the amendment as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 11, line 2, after the words "District of Columbia," to strike out:

Provided further, That this sum shall not be available until the Bureau of Efficiency shall have investigated the methods of transacting the public business in the Bureau of Internal Revenue and made recommendations for the improvement thereof and submitted the same to the Secretary of the Treasury for his approval, and the work of the Bureau of Efficiency hereunder shall be performed within 60 days after the approval of this act.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, I want those paragraphs transposed, the matter in that amendment to follow line 9, on page 23. I will send an amendment to the desk to that effect. It is merely a transposition in order to make greater clearness in the bill.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to transpose the paragraph just read to follow line 9 on page 23.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to, and the transposition will be made.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 76, line 17, to change the number of the section from 3 to 4.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I understand that completes the committee amendments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It does.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. There is an amendment which I will send to the desk. It is not a committee amendment, but it is one to which I am sure there can be no objection. The Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] handed it to me. It is a very small matter and one that will meet with commendation, I think, from every Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 76, after line 22, it is proposed to insert:

SEC. 5. Section 14 of the public buildings act approved March 4, 1913 (Stat. L., vol. 37, p. 882), which created a commission to direct the construction of a memorial amphitheater in the national cemetery at Arlington, Va., is amended to substitute the name of John McElroy, representing the Grand Army of the Republic, in the place of Ivory G. Kimball, deceased.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is all right.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. It is just a substitution in place of a deceased member.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I offer an amendment that I know the chairman of the committee thinks is proper.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 54, after line 20, it is proposed to insert:

To pay Caroline F. Martin, Vallie B. Williamson, Lucy E. Boyd, and Ethelyn H. Stubbs, daughters; Lewis A. Burleigh, son; and Edwin C. Burleigh and Donald Q. Burleigh, grandsons, of the late Senator Edwin C. Burleigh, from the State of Maine, $7,500.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I am glad to have that amendment adopted. It simply provides that one year's salary shall be paid to the late Senator BURLEIGH'S family.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. In behalf of the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] I offer the amendment which I send to the desk. It has passed the Senate once.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. That is the Vicksburg amendment?

Mr. SMOOT. It is for the national celebration at Vicksburg.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. The veterans of both armies are anxious to have it, and I hope it will be adopted. I consent to it so far as I am able to do so.

Mr. OWEN. What is the amount?

Mr. SMOOT. One hundred and fifty thousand dollars.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 32, after line 19, it is proposed to insert:

Whereas a memorial celebration and peace jublice was held at Gettysburg, Pa., on the fiftieth anniversary of the battle fought at that place during the War between the States in July, 1913, and such celebration gave to the veterans of the Union Army, known as the Army of the Potomac, and the Confederate Army, known as the Army of the Virginia, an opportunity in such a gathering of peace and unity; and

Whereas coincidently with that battle an equally important event to this country occurred in July, 1863, in the siege and defense of Vicksburg, the survivors of the Armies of the Tennessee and of the Mississippi, who participated in that siege, now desire to join in a national memorial celebration and peace jubilee to commemorate the victories and virtues leading to the half century of peace and prosperity to the American Nation, and, further, to strengthen the fraternal ties of brotherly amity in a United Nation of States:

That the Secretary of War be, and is hereby, authorized and directed as follows:

First. To provide and furnish all necessary sewerage, sanitation, and hospital service for health and accommodation of persons attending upon such occasion.

Second. To provide and furnish all necessary camp and garrison equipment for visiting veterans of the Civil War, together with all necessary rations and supplies, properly prepared and served, for such veterans during said celebration.

That the steps hereinbefore authorized to be taken by the War Department shall be fully completed before the 14th day of October, 1917, and that all camp equipment, including tents, supplies, and rations shall be fully ready for occupancy and use.

That the National Association of Vicksburg Veterans, formed in the city of Chicago, Ill., August 9, 1913, shall have charge of the order or exercises during the celebration; that the physical control of the camp and grounds and the movement of the troops and marching bodies therein shall be in the hands of the Secretary of War, under such officers as he may detail for that purpose.

That there is hereby appropriated from the Treasury of the United States, out of funds not otherwise appropriated, such sum as may be necessary to carry out the foregoing pr visions of this act, not exceeding the sum of $150,000: Provided, That, out of the said sum of $150,000 thus appropriated, no part thereof shall be available or expended for the purpose provided in this act until after January 1, 1917.

That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to reimburse and pay, out of the funds herein appr priated, the traveling expenses of the members of the council of administration or of the executive committee of the National Association of Vicksburg Veterans for journeys authorized by him to be taken in attendance upon meetings in the interest of this celebration: Provided, That the number of members shall at no time exceed seven at any one meeting.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Do I understand that the chairman of the committee has accepted the amendment?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. It is in the bill.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I am very much obliged to the Senator.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I yield to the Senator from Colorado, who has an amendment to present.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, the War Department is very anxious, in the event it is impossible to pass the Porto Rican civil government bill, to have the election there postponed.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I have no objection to the amendment. I will let it go to conference, and if by that time the bill is passed it can be eliminated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After line 22, page 76, insert:

SEC. 5. That in the event H. R. 9533, entitled "An act to provide a civil government for Porto Rico, and for other purposes," is not enacted during this session of Congress, the election in Porto Rico fixed for the first Monday of November, 1916, shall be postponed to a date to be hereafter fixed by the President of the United States, and the present incumbents of the offices which were to be filled at that election shall continue in office until the officers elected at the postponed election shall qualify.

Mr. JONES. On what authority do they hold the election?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Under authority of an act of Congress. There was no objection whatever to the amendment by any member of the committee. It was unanimously in favor of it.

Mr JONES. If that bill does not go through this will not postpone the election.

Mr. SHAFROTH. If the bill goes through in December the election can be held in January. It will then answer all the purposes, and a postponement for two years will not be necessary.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KERN. I offer an amendment and ask the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] to explain it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. Insert the following:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to consider and favorably adjudicate, under the act of Congress approved July 27, 1912 (Public No. 244), entitled "An act extending the time for the repayment of certain war-revenue taxes erroneously collected," claims of trust companies or other claimants for refund of taxes illegally collected on capital, surplus, or undivided profits, in accordance with the decisions of the circuit court of appeals in the case of Treat, collector, against the Farmers Loan & Trust Co. and the Central Trust Co of New York, reported in One hundred and eighty-fifth Federal Reporter, pages 760 to 765.

Mr. BRYAN. There were probably from 50 to 75 other like amendments, and they are nothing but private claims. The committee refused to put in private claims, and it would be manifestly unfair to allow some to pass in the Senate. Therefore I raise a point of order against the amendment. It is a private claim upon an appropriation bill.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations promised me last year that this matter should be given consideration when the next deficiency bill came up.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. In reply I will say that careful consideration was given by the committee, and the committee refused to put the claim in the bill. That is all there is to it. There are a dozen such claims from my State, and I have a special-delivery letter on my desk, received just this afternoon, regarding one. The question is whether we will load this bill up with claims.

Mr. KERN. The amendment only authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to consider and favorably adjudicate certain claims. The courts have decided the question.

Mr. WEEKS. It does not provide for an appropriation. It is a question of adjudicated claims. The courts have decided in two cases that the claims were justifiable. It does not seem to me to be fair or honest to refuse to permit the Treasury Department to adjudicate claims that are presumably good.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. It is plain legislation on an appropriation bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair feels constrained to sustain the point of order raised by the Senator from Florida.

Mr. WEEKS. Do I understand that the Chair sustains the point of order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair feels bound, in view of the precedent and the information he has received, to sustain the point of order.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I do not think that this matter is being treated fairly, and if the point of order is going to be made against this amendment I shall have to make the point of no quorum.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I am very sorry to see a spirit of that sort shown, but it will not swerve me from the course my duty requires. It is perfectly plain that we can not get a quorum to-night and we want to finish the bill to-day. It is in the power of the Senator from Massachusetts to prevent it. If he makes the point of no quorum that ends the bill for this afternoon. We are through with all except some private claims that have no proper place on the bill. There are hundreds of them in like condition, and I do not think that we ought to expect to force them into the bill. Certainly they can not force them. As far as I am concerned, I would see the whole bill defeated before I would be intimidated by such a proceeding.

Mr. WEEKS. The Senator has been intimidated once before to-day and he may get in the habit of it. It may do him good to be intimidated again.

Mr. OWEN. Unless that amendment is to be insisted upon I should like to offer an amendment. On page 24, line 20, I move to strike out "four" and insert "six," so as to give more clerks for the Surgeon General's office. There is one estimated for at $2,200, and the other at $2,100. I hope the chairman of the committee will allow it to go to conference to be considered there.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. This bill is not a bill to fix salaries or create offices.

Mr. OWEN. This was estimated for.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I know there are a great many estimates here for additional appointments and increases of salaries, and the committee felt constrained to put a check on them; otherwise the Treasury would be bankrupt. The legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill is the proper place for salaries to be considered, and surely the department and the Senators who have studied these matters can wait until next winter when that bill is before the Senate. Let them present such matters then and they will have consideration; but we could not agree to turn this general deficiency bill into a bill to create offices or increase salaries. I hope the Senator from Oklahoma will not insist on the amendment. He is on the committee and did not present it to the committee.

Mr. OWEN. I will not insist upon it, but the estimate provided for it.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I do not question the estimate. If we had to appropriate all the money estimated for the Government would soon be bankrupt.

The committee does not agree to give as far as the estimates go. We have turned down a great many of them. I am glad the Senator does not insist upon the amendment.

Mr. SHIELDS. I offer the following amendment, to come in on page 7, after line 8.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 7, after line 8, it is proposed to insert the following:

Rogersville, Tenn., post office: For continuation (site) $250.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I think that is a proper amendment. It does not increase the limit of cost, but gives $250 to complete the purchase of the site and I think it ought to be allowed.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JONES. I wish to say just a word or two before the amendment I have to offer is read. I am going to offer an amendment to pay Simon M. Preston, of Seattle, a certain sum of money. I have introduced the bill heretofore, and it has been reported twice from the Committee on Claims and has passed the Senate twice and been reported favorably in the House and has simply failed to pass there because one Member could prevent it. This man is nearly 100 years old and it does seem to me a claim that the committee and the Senate have found to be just ought to be paid to this man before he passes away, as he is bound to do soon.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. How much is the amount?

Mr. JONES. Five thousand eight hundred and thirty-eight dollars and thirty-six cents.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. It is a very pathetic case, but a man who has as large a claim as $5,000, I presume can get along when it is in contravention of the rule, and I am compelled to make a point of order against the amendment.

Mr. JONES. I want to say to the Senator that I do not think it is in contravention of the rule.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. There is no estimate for it. I know nothing about the claim.

Mr. JONES. Here is the rule:

And no amendments shall be received to any general appropriation bill the effect of which will be to increase an appropriation already contained in the bill, or to add a new item of appropriation, unless it be made to carry out the provisions of some existing law, or treaty stipulation, or act, or resolution previously passed by the Senate during that session.

"Or resolution previously passed by the Senate during that session," and it has passed the Senate during this session. It seems to me that it comes under that provision of the Senate rules.

Mr. GALLINGER. This case appeals to me very strongly, but I want to remind the chairman of the committee that I offered an amendment to pay a certain amount of money—$1,200—to Mr. Frank W. Hackett. The bill has passed the Senate twice and has been reported favorably to the House, so if the bill is to be opened to claims of that kind I can not justify myself; I have written to Mr. Hackett that the committee rejected it on the ground——

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I remember the Hackett claim was rejected and the committee has uniformly rejected claims of this sort. As far as I am concerned I can not give my consent to making favorites of a few claims to come in here in the closing hours of the consideration of the bill. I do not think it ought to be put in and I hope the Senate will not put it in.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington state that the payment of this money was authorized by a resolution?

Mr. JONES. I simply read the rule of the Senate. The resolution has not been enacted into law. If that had been the case, there would be no necessity for the amendment. But it has passed the Senate twice.

Mr. BRYAN. A resolution or a bill?

Mr. JONES. A bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That does not bring it within the rule. That is the reason why the Chair made the inquiry of the Senator. If this was money to be paid under a resolution which had already passed the Senate, in that case it would be proper to offer the amendment; but as the Chair understands the Senator's statement, he feels constrained to rule that the amendment is not in order.

Mr. JONES. I want to do everything I can to get it through.

Mr. BRYAN. The Senator has done that; he has had the bill passed twice.

Mr. JONES. I see the position of the chairman of the Committee on Claims, but I do feel that this man ought to have this claim paid.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. It is matter for the Claims Committee; and the Senator knows that many other similar claims were brought to the Committee on Appropriations and rejected.

Mr. JONES. That is true.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. We can not depart from the rule. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] has one I would be delighted to see in the bill, but we must be uniform in our procedure in this matter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. PENROSE. I offer an amendment to the bill. I do not know whether the chairman of the committee will think that a point of order lies to it or not, but I should like to have it read and submitted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 20, after line 7, insert:

To enable the Gettysburg National Park Commission to acquire by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise, additional land adjacent or contiguous to the Gettysburg National Park, for the purpose of preserving as nearly as possible the Gettysburg battle field according to the original metes and bounds, $32,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

Mr. PENROSE. I understand this is recommended by the War Department.

Mr. BRYAN. Has it been estimated for?

Mr. PENROSE. I think they recommend that amount.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. No estimate has come to the committee for it.

Mr. PENROSE. I desire to submit it.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I hope the Senator will not press it. We would like to put it in, but we can not do it consistently.

Mr. PENROSE. All right, I will not press it.

The Senate has already adopted an amendment placing the civil-service requirement as applied to employees under an item of $200,000 of appropriations. I offer a similar amendment, a proviso, to go in on page 11, at the end of the paragraph.

The SECRETARY. On page 11, after the words "District of Columbia," in line 2, insert:

All appointments of such officers, experts, clerks, agents, inspectors, messengers, janitors, and other above-mentioned employees shall be made from the eligible lists of the Civil Service Commission and in accordance with the provisions of the civil-service law.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Surely the Senator does not think all the experts must be selected in that way. I have no desire to cripple the civil service, but we may cripple the department service by making impossible conditions.

Mr. PENROSE. As I understand it, all experts were under the civil service until the recent raids made on the merit system.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. There are a great many lawyers employed as experts.

Mr. PENROSE. The amendment does not include lawyers.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I hope the Senator will not press the amendment. I have not had an opportunity to consider what its scope is.

Mr. PENROSE. I am willing to leave out the word "experts."

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. If the Senator insists on it, of course we can not understand its scope clearly from hearing it hastily read, but it can go into conference and we will consider it there.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment as modified will be agreed to.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I observe that on pages 5 and 6 the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to refund to the estate of J. L. da Roza Estate (Inc.), of Elkgrove, Cal., the sum of money named in the bill.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. If the Senator from Wisconsin will permit me right now in order to save time, I can readily see how he misunderstood that. That is in pursuance of a law which authorizes that amount of money to be paid.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I understand, but I am going to offer an amendment. A bill has twice passed the Senate to refund money to people here from whom unjust customs duties were collected over 40 years ago.

The Court of Claims has investigated the matter and passed upon it, and adjudicated that they should have had that money refunded to them. The Senate has passed the bill, and it has been favorably reported two or three different times and put on the House calendar, and it has never gotten through. It is on the House calendar now and stands no chance of getting through. I will say that the wife of one of the claimants is the daughter of Col. Ingersoll. These people have been kept out of this money for a generation; it belongs to them; it ought to be put on this or any other bill that is passing the Senate. I am going to offer it as an amendment to-night, and I am in dead earnest about it.

Mr. PENROSE. What is the amount?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The amendment I offer is to come in after this provision to pay this sum which is in the bill on pages 5 and 6. I offer it to come in after line 6, on page 3.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 6, after line 6, insert:

The Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Walston H. Brown, sole surviving partner of the firm of Brown, Howard & Co., the sum of $65,792.53, and the estate of Henry A. V. Post, deceased, the sum of $50,359.35, as a refund of import duties paid in excess of the duties imposed by law on steel blooms, as found by the Court of Claims.

Mr. BRYAN. Let me ask the Senator when was the finding of the Court of Claims?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I can not give you the date. I can send for the papers and get the date. It was some two or three years ago, it may be longer, that the Court of Claims ascertained this amount to be due. The committee of which the distinguished Senator from Florida is chairman, the Committee on Claims, reported favorably upon this claim two or three different times, and it has been before the Senate and has been well considered. The Committee on Finance this year unanimously reported the bill favorably, and it passed the Senate unanimously, there being not a dissenting vote against it.

Mr. BRYAN. I am familiar with the claim.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I know you are.

Mr. BRYAN. The Committee on Claims reported it, it passed through that committee and then went to the Committee on Finance, and it has been passed there. Does it not occur to the Senator, though, that this is not a claims bill; that it is a deficiency bill?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I know it is; but if you wait on a claims bill, you would wait until these claimants are dead, and it is not fair; it is not just. You have put into this bill something very nearly akin to it, which is printed in italics on pages 5 and 6.

Mr. BRYAN. I can explain to the Senator——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The Senator will be able to distinguish it in some way by some fine shade of distinction, I have no doubt.

Mr. BRYAN. Let us see. Some days ago Congress passed a bill relating to the da Roza claim, and it became a law; but in the law the words "out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated" were left out, which made it defective. That is remedied in this bill.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. But it is no more meritorious than the claim I have proposed, and it is added to this bill simply because of some error. Now, I am asking to have this claim put in this bill because it has been defeated again and again by some technical objection in another body. It is quite as just a claim as is the one which has been inserted in this bill.

Mr. BRYAN. Let me ask the Senator, then, if he would be willing not to offer his amendment if we reconsider the vote whereby the amendment now in the bill was agreed to, and leave out that amendment?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. No; I have no doubt that justice is being done in that case; and I do not want to do the claimant a wrong.

Mr. BRYAN. The da Roza amendment was added to the bill in pursuance of a law which has passed Congress.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Well, my amendment should be added in pursuance of what ought to have been law a long time ago and will be if it is inserted in this bill. I offer the amendment, Mr. President.

Mr. BRYAN. I raise the point of order against the amendment.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Then, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. SIMMONS. I ask the Senator not to do that. I desire to say to the Senator, if he will withdraw the suggestion, I will move that the Senate take a recess, and the matter may be thrashed out on Monday.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, I do not see how the Senator can expect to secure for the claim in which he is interested an advantage over all other claims. There are hundreds of thousands of people in exactly the same situation.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. But they are not here, and I am here.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. They have been here. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN] is here now with a number of them.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. If the amendment is added to the bill and allowed to go to conference, I will appear before the conferees; and if I can not convince them that it ought to stay in the bill they may strike it out.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Very well; I will let it go in under those circumstances. I know it can not live five minutes in conference.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I will take my chances on it, because it is just.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Very well; let it go in under the statement made.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments to the bill and request a conference with the House, the conferees on the part of the Senate to be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to; and the Presiding Officer appointed Mr. MARTIN of Virginia, Mr. BRYAN, and Mr. SMOOT conferees on the part of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HUGHES). The Chair, as acting President pro tempore of the Senate, announces his signature to the enrolled bill (H. R. 15158) to amend the Judicial Code; to fix the time when the annual term of the Supreme Court shall commence; and further to define the jurisdiction of that court, which had heretofore been signed by the Speaker of the House.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT MADISON, WIS.

Mr. SWANSON. From the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds I report back favorably without amendment the bill (H. R. 14391) authorizing the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building thereon at Madison, Wis., and for other purposes.

Mr. SIMMONS. I move that the Senate take a recess until Monday at 11 o'clock.

Mr. SWANSON. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill just reported by me; and I will request the Senator from North Carolina to withhold his motion for a moment or two for that purpose. I will say that the bill was called up several days ago, but the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] made objection to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina withhold his motion?

Mr. SWANSON. It will take only a moment to consider the bill.

Mr. SIMMONS. I will withhold the motion if the bill will only take a moment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I do not know anything about the bill.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me, I can explain it to him in a moment. In 1913 a bill was passed appropriating $550,000 for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building thereon at Madison, Wis., involving the demolition of the old building and the erection of a new building on the same site. The department has recommended instead of building a new post office and courthouse on the old site that the old site be sold, that the proceeds be put in the Treasury, and that the same amount as originally appropriated be used in connection with buying another site and erecting the building. The bill has passed the House.

Mr. SMOOT. There was some objection made to the bill by a Senator a few days ago, was there not?

Mr. SWANSON. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] objected to the consideration of the bill because he wanted it referred to the committee. The committee has examined it and unanimously reported it back.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed

REVENUE BILL—WINE SCHEDULE.

Mr. PHELAN. I beg to submit a letter written by me to the Secretary of Agriculture and the reply of the department, which substantiate my claim that the department does not approve of stretching wine more than 25 per cent, and that my amendment was recommended by the department and was, in fact, the department's own amendment. I ask that the letters may be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

The letters referred to are as follows:

AUGUST 30, 1916.

Hon. D. F. HOUSTON,
Secretary of Agriculture.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: I beg to call your attention to page 13300 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of August 28, giving the text of an amendment which Senator HUGHES offered to the wine section of the revenue bill, which amendment was adopted. But first I offered as a substitute the amendment which was approved by the department. (See p. 13302.) This is the same, with the exception of an addition of a definition of pure sugar, as you sent to Senator SIMMONS on August 21.

It is perfectly clear to me that the department stands for a limit of 25 per cent of stretching, but the Hughes amendment provides for 35 per cent of stretching, and on top of that 35 per cent more. I contended on the faith of the letter of your department, above referred to, dated August 21 and addressed to Senator SIMMONS, that the department recommended 25 per cent stretching, and nothing else, and disputed Senator HUGHES'S contention that the department had in some way indorsed the excessive stretching which he recommended.

You will observe that in the RECORD of August 29, page 15615, Senator HUGHES refers to a visit he paid to the Agricultural Department and explicitly states that he laid the legislation which was then pending before the Senate before several gentlemen connected with the department "to see if they had any objection to its form or its substance. I saw Dr. Emerson, the Acting Chief of the United States Bureau of Chemistry," etc. "They read these amendments and suggested some slight changes, and after the discussion Dr. Emerson, speaking for the bureau, said they had no objection to the amendment as I submitted it."

Now, that amendment provides, as I have stated, for stretching wine, first, 35 per cent, and again on top of that 35 per cent more, whereas, the amendment sent to Senator SIMMONS on August 21 limited the stretching to 25 per cent, and then under proper safeguards. I would like to learn from the department whether Dr. Emerson, speaking for the bureau, said that they had no objection to the amendment as submitted by Senator HUGHES, either as to its form or its substance. I know that the department has nothing to do with making laws, but I assume that when, by request, in a matter which has been very generally discussed, their views are given, such advice is the conviction of the department, as to the merits of the controversy.

If, as I suspect, your department was asked as a matter of administration, if they had any objection to a certain law or proposed law with respect to its enforcement, you might say that you can enforce one law as well an another, without going into the merits of the law itself. What I desire to know is whether, with your superior and expert knowledge available at all times, the department would recommend any other amendment than that submitted by you to Senator SIMMONS on August 21 and amended with respect to the purity of sugar by Assistant Secretary Marvin in a letter to Senator SIMMONS dated August 26.

I assured the Senate that that amendment was the amendment approved by the Department of Agriculture, and I desire to know now from the Department of Agriculture, first, whether or not I was correct in my statement; and, secondly, what is the correct construction to put upon Dr. Emerson's remark after the discussion with Senator HUGHES, as quoted on page 15615 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of August 29, 1916.

An early reply will very much oblige me.

Very truly, yours, JAMES D. PHELAN.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
Washington, August 31, 1916.

Hon. JAMES D. PHELAN,
United States Senate.

DEAR SENATOR PHELAN: Reference is made to your letter of August 30, 1916, in which you invite attention to the discussion in the Senate as to the views of this department concerning the amendment of section 53 of the pending revenue bill, and inquire whether you were correct in your statement that the amendment approved by the department was the amendment submitted with the department's letter of August 21, 1916, and amended with respect to the purity of sugar, by its letter of August 26, 1916, to Senator SIMMONS.

In reply you are informed that the amendment submitted by the department received very careful consideration and represents its deliberate views. With reference to the amount of water which it is necessary to add to wine to correct natural deficiencies, the department has uniformly maintained that it is unnecessary to add water in excess of 25 per cent. While it has been urged on behalf of the wine makers of Ohio and Missouri that it is necessary to add more than 25 per cent of water, the department has not changed its opinion in this respect.

Concerning Senator HUGHES'S conference with officials of the Bureau of Chemistry, I am informed that the question discussed at the conference was as to whether the Hughes amendment would interfere with the enforcement of the Federal food and drugs act. Section 53 of the revenue bill as reported by the Committee on Finance to the Senate contains provisions fixing the definition of wine for the purposes of the food and drugs act, as well as for the purposes of the revenue bill. These provisions were objected to by the department as establishing an undesirable precedent, and the object of Senator HUGHES'S visit to the Bureau of Chemistry was to ascertain whether, in the opinion of the officials charged with the administration of the food and drugs act, the language of his bill was open to the same objection, and whether, if adopted, it would interfere with the enforcement of the food and drugs act. The officials of the Bureau of Chemistry agree that the substance of what transpired at their conference with Senator HUGHES is fairly stated by him in his remarks on page 15552 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of August 28, 1916. Senator HUGHES said:

"I understand that the Agricultural Department had decided objection to the amendment as proposed and as printed in the pending bill, for the reason that it seemed to interfere with the jurisdiction of the Agricultural Department, so far as the definition of wine was concerned, and the labeling of wine and the administration of the pure food and drugs act. However, I took the matter up with the Pure Food and Drug Division or bureau, or whatever its technical name and title may be, of the Department of Agriculture, and submitted to them the language of this substitute. They informed me that, so far as their bureau was concerned, and so far as the administration of the pure food and drugs act was concerned, they had no objection to the language."

The statement appearing in the remarks of Senator HUGHES, on page 15615 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of August 29, 1916, that "Dr. Emerson, speaking for the bureau, said they had no objection to the amendment as I submitted it," is to be taken as an expression of opinion that the Hughes's amendment would not defeat the administration of the food and drugs act. It is, of course, for Congress, and not this department, to determine whether or not water can be added to wine. Whether the amounts be limited to 25 per cent, or whether the addition of water be permitted in unlimited amounts, so long as the addition of water is permitted only under adequate supervision by the Bureau of Internal Revenue, the problem of administering the food and drugs act, according to the standard set by Congress, is the same. It was from this standpoint that the Hughes's amendment was discussed at the conference between Senator HUGHES and the officials of the Bureau of Chemistry, and it seems clear to the department from the remarks of Senator HUGHES printed in the RECORD that he so understands it.

Very truly, yours, C. F. MARVIN,
Acting Secretary.

ESTIMATE OF APPROPRIATIONS (S. DOC. NO. 542).

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the Secretary of War of the 1st instant, submitting supplemental estimates of appropriations required by the War Department for the service of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, contingent expenses, War Department, $12,700; stationery, War Department, $7,000; which, with the accompany paper, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota:

A bill (S. 6983) granting an increase of pension to George W. Smith (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

THE REVENUE.

Mr. GALLINGER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 16763) to increase the revenue, and for other purposes, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

COMPENSATION OF INJURED EMPLOYEES.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 15316) granting compensation to the employees of the United States Government suffering injuries while in the performance of their duties, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives agreeing to the amendment of the Senate numbered 2 to the bill (H. R. 15316) to provide compensation for employees of the United States suffering injuries while in the performance of their duties, and for other purposes, and agreeing to the amendment of the Senate numbered 1 with an amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The effect of the amendment of the House is to entirely abolish every organization in any one of the departments looking toward the investigation or consideration of the status of injured employees. I think it is impossible for us to proceed in that way at present, because our bill does not provide the organization by which the new commission can handle the subject.

I move that the Senate disagree to the House amendment, and request a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, the conferees on the part of the Senate to be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to; and the President pro tempore appointed Mr. SMITH of Georgia, Mr. SWANSON, and Mr. BORAH conferees on the part of the Senate.

RECESS.

Mr. SIMMONS. I renew my motion, that the Senate take a recess until Monday morning at 11 o'clock.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 7 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m., Saturday, September 2, 1916) the Senate took a recess until Monday, September 4, 1916, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, September 2, 1916.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Father Almighty, before whom millions bow in adoration day by day and receive the uplift of the spirit which enables them to fight valiantly and successfully the battles of life, so we bow in Thy presence, praying for the baptism of the spirit, which shall enable us to discern more clearly the way, and do more faithfully the duties devolving upon us, individually and collectively. In the spirit of the Lord Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

BILLS TO REMOVE CHARGES OF DESERTION.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, there are on the calendar about 20 bills that are commonly referred to as bills to remove charges of desertion, which gives pensionable status. They were in order yesterday. I think they will take no considerable time. I ask unanimous consent that those bills may be considered now in the House as in Committee of the Whole, provided that if any one objects to any one it shall go over.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the bills which were in order yesterday——

Mr. MANN. Only these particular bills relating to charges of desertion——

The SPEAKER. Yes; be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole, and where anybody objects they shall go over.

Mr. HASTINGS. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, those bills are on the Private Calendar?

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. HASTINGS. Where do we begin?

The SPEAKER. The Chair's recollection is that we were to begin at No. 411. That was the general order made on the day before yesterday.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee objects.

Mr. MANN. On what subject?

Mr. FOSTER. On the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, I make the same request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] makes the same request. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, I make the same request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio also asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the state of the Union. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

DEBT DUE THE GOVERNMENT BY THE CITY OF AUGUSTA, GA.

Mr. VINSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (S. 5407) authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Treasury to extend the time of payment of the amount due the Government by the city of Augusta, Ga., a similar House bill being on the Union Calendar, No. 303, and put it upon its passage.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 5407) authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Treasury to extend the time of payment of the amount due the Government by the city of Augusta, Ga.

Be it enacted, etc., That so much of the provisions of the act of March 4, 1911, making appropriations for the sundry civil expenses of the Government as relates to the United States post office and courthouse at the city of Augusta, Ga., be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to authorize and direct the Secretary of the Treasury to extend the time of payment of the amount due the Government by the city of Augusta for a period of five years, without interest, the Government of the United States retaining title to the property until payment in full is made by the city, but delivering possession and use of the property, without rental or other charges, to the city of Augusta pending such payment.

Mr. VINSON. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. KEATING. I desire, Mr. Speaker, to reserve the right to object.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, on line 10, page 1, by striking out the words "without interest" and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "with interest from the date of the passage of this act at the rate of 4 per cent per annum."

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, did the gentleman ask unanimous consent for the consideration of that amendment?

Mr. VINSON. Yes; in connection with the bill. It is amending the bill.

Mr. GARRETT. I object to the amendment.

Mr. VINSON. I will say to the gentleman from Tennessee that the city of Augusta is indebted now to the Government in the sum of $34,000, growing out of the exchange of certain properties relative to the building of a new post-office building, and the city of Augusta desires that this indebtedness be extended for a period of five years, occasioned by the great loss the city sustained about six months ago by a fire, which amounted to about $7,000,000. The city is perfectly willing to pay 4 per cent interest if the Government will extend the period in which they are to pay this debt.

Mr. GARRETT. I misunderstood. I thought the amendment proposed that the Government should pay interest.

Mr. VINSON. No. We will pay that interest if the Government extends this debt.

Mr. GARRETT. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I withdraw my objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill as amended.

The Senate bill as amended was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. VINSON, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, a House bill (H. R. 16630) of similar tenor will lie on the table.

There was no objection.

RELIEF OF JOHN DUGGAN.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill S. 3268, which was favorably reported by the Committee on Military Affairs and passed by the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to call up the bill S. 3268. Is the Senate bill on the House Calendar or not?

Mr. TREADWAY. It is on the Private Calendar—No. 428.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 3268) for the relief of John Duggan.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of the pension laws John Duggan, alias John McCarty (or McCarthy), shall hereafter be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the military service of the United States as a private of Troop K, Sixth Regiment United States Cavalry, on the 27th day of July, 1865: Provided, That no pension shall accrue prior to the passage of this act.

Mr. TREADWAY. I shall be glad to answer any question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. GARRETT. I would like to inquire about the circumstances of the case.

Mr. TREADWAY. I will explain the circumstances, Mr. Speaker. This is a bill that originally passed the Senate in the Sixty-second Congress. It did not pass the House. It was not reached in the House. It was reintroduced in the Sixty-third Congress and was favorably reported by the subcommittee of the Committee on Military Affairs in the House. That is as far as it got at that time. In the Sixty-fourth Congress it was introduced again, and has passed the Senate, with a favorable report from the Committee on Military Affairs submitted by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA], and has been favorably reported by the subcommittee of which the gentleman from New York [Mr. CALDWELL] is chairman to the Committee on Military Affairs, and favorably reported by that committee.

The circumstances were these: The man enlisted, served three years, and reenlisted in 1864. He was a young man at that time, of course, and at the close of the war simply went to his home in Adams, Mass., failing to secure a proper paper of discharge. The matter has never been adjusted since that time. He is now old, decrepit, almost blind, and of course for his last days it would be a gratification to him to have this technical blot, which is not actually a record against his honorable service, removed, because it does stand against him on the records of the department.

I think those are the circumstances of this case, and I think the other gentlemen on the Committee on Military Affairs will bear out the statement I have made about it.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. TREADWAY. Certainly.

Mr. GARRETT. There seem to have been a rather surprising number of these so-called desertion bills reported at this session of Congress. During the time that I have been a Member of the House I do not believe there has ever been any particular private claim guarded with more scrupulous care than these claims, if they may be so called, for the removal of the charge of desertion.

As far back as 1876 or 1878, if I remember correctly—possibly I may be mistaken in the date—the Congress of the United States passed an act, signed by the President, which became a law, which provided a method for the removal of charges of desertion. I have no doubt my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY] is perfectly familiar with it. The matter has been called to my attention several times by constituents in my district, and I have had many applications for removals, or asking me to get special acts passed for the removal of charges of desertion, and I have always pointed them to the law on the statute books. That provided that where a soldier served out his term of enlistment, or where he served until May 1, 1865, or was prevented from doing either of those things by disability contracted in the line of duty, he should receive an honorable discharge. Now, that law was the expression of the best judgment of the Congress of the United States at a time when I think, perhaps, it was most competent temperamentally to deal with that question. I do not understand that the gentleman's case comes within the general law. This is an effort to extend the general law in a special case. I do not think bills of that sort ought to be pressed, and I do not believe they ought to pass.

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Speaker, since I have been chairman of the subcommittee on desertions I have given a great deal of thought to these cases. It is true that there is a law to which the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] has referred, but it is also true that there are many cases of merit which are not reached by this law. The subcommittee on desertions, that has considered a number of cases this year, has been particularly careful. It has been the policy of that committee to refuse absolutely to grant relief in a case of real intentional desertion. The committee realizes that the welfare of the Army of the United States must be carefully guarded, and that has been our him on the one hand. But on the other hand, where a man has served his country and has left behind him a good record, but because of some unfortunate and unavoidable circumstances, for which he was in no way responsible, he was deprived of securing an honorable discharge, I believe that that man should be recognized by this Congress and should be given the relief that is asked for in this bill.

Then there is another class of cases like this: Here is a man who served his country during the war and reenlisted in 1864.

Mr. TREADWAY. February 10, 1864.

Mr. FIELDS. And after the war was over he went to his home. I do not remember this case particularly. I do not know how far he was away from the point where the discharge would have been issued; but there are many cases of this character, where men were two or three or four hundred miles away from the point where their discharges were being issued, who were nearer their homes than they were to the point where the discharges were being issued. They had served their country through the struggle, the war was then over, and when they were told by their commanding officers that the war was over they returned to their homes without their discharges rather than encounter the hardships which would attend a journey to the point of muster out. The intent constitutes the crime. There was no evil intent in the minds of these men. They had discharged their duties as patriotic citizens, and after they had done all that they could do for their country they returned to their homes and their families from which they had been separated through the bloody struggle. Mr. Speaker, I believe that this Government is too great. I believe that men on the floor of this House should be more liberal than to perpetuate the stain upon the reputations of those men who served their country clear through the struggle and then returned to their homes without any intention of deserting the flag. [Applause.] In cases of this character your subcommittee have recommended relief, and I trust that the House will grant the relief.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman permit me to make an inquiry?

Mr. FIELDS. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT. Am I correct in my recollection of the general law? If a man served his term of enlistment, or served until May 1, 1865, or was prevented from so doing my disability contracted while in the line of duty, the charge can be removed under the general law, can it not?

Mr. FIELDS. There are many cases where the charge has not been removed under the general law, because the report comes back that the evidence did not warrant the removal under the general law; but the proof before the committee in these cases has shown, in many cases, that the soldier was sick in a hospital or sick at his home. There are many other cases of this character, where the proof clearly shows that the claimant was sick as a result of wounds. Perhaps he was sent to a hospital for a few days or a few weeks. Then probably some of his friends took him away, took him to his home, and he was unable to return to duty, and failed to make his report back to his commanding officer, and was, therefore, marked as a deserter. Now, Mr. Speaker, that is too small an excuse for this Government to take advantage of with the man who has served his country and has not intentionally deserted it.

Mr. GARRETT. Is the gentleman familiar with the particular case that we have before us now, the case of John Duggan?

Mr. FIELDS. I do not remember the particular case. I have been away.

Mr. GARRETT. If the gentleman will permit, there does not seem to be any other member of the Military Affairs Committee here. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY] presented this matter. The report states that—

> John Duggan, alias John McCarty, enlisted August 14, 1861, at Rochester, N. Y., and was assigned to Troop K, Sixth United States Cavalry, as a private. He reenlisted in the same troop February 10, 1864, and served faithfully until July 27, 1865. The evidence shows that John Duggan, alias John McCarty, left his command in July, 1865, because the war was over.

Now, if I am correct in my recollection of the law, and this man served until July 7, 1865, faithfully, as this report states, he is entitled to an honorable discharge under the general law, and it does not require a special act. Therefore, I can not fail but to believe that in some way there is something about the matter not stated in the report which would prevent him from getting it.

Mr. FIELDS. The gentleman will concede that if he rendered this service he is entitled to this relief?

Mr. GARRETT. I concede that the law provides for it.

Mr. FIELDS. But the gentleman will concede that if he served faithfully he is entitled to this relief?

Mr. GARRETT. I make the statement that the general law provides that if he served out his term of enlistment——

Mr. FIELDS. But that does not answer my question.

Mr. GARRETT. I will answer the gentleman's question if he insists upon it. I think there is no thing concerning which the Government ought to be more scrupulously careful than guarding the honor and credit of its military forces. I believe every man, in order to have rights, honors, and privileges, ought to have an honorable discharge granted under the law, and that he ought not to have these rights unless he does get an honorable discharge.

Mr. FIELDS. I want to say that the committee has concealed nothing from the House in this case. Neitner does it report to this House a bill if there is anything behind it that looks black or would not entitle a man to the relief asked for.

As I said before, I believe this Government is too great to measure the patriotism of a soldier who served through the greatest struggle the Nation has ever known by some unfortunate, unavoidable circumstances for which the soldier was not responsible; and the committee has taken these things into consideration, and at the same time the committee has taken into consideration the welfare of the Military Establishment of this country. In no case where it was plainly a case of desertion—where the claimant intended to desert—has the committee reported favorably upon it.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FIELDS. This is not my time.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I would like to ask why the committee does not print the report of The Adjutant General in connection with the report to the House?

Mr. FIELDS. We do not consider a case until we first get a report from The Adjutant General.

Mr. SLAYDEN. It formerly was the custom to print the letter of The Adjutant General in reply—to embody it in the report. Have you abandoned that custom?

Mr. FIELDS. No; but I wish to say to the gentleman that when this report was made I was absent at home, engaged in my campaign.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I hope the gentleman won out.

Mr. FIELDS. I did. I want to say, however, that the committee has not reported a case unless it had a good report from the War Department as to the soldier's service while with his command.

Mr. SLAYDEN. When I had the honor of serving on the Committee on Military Affairs it was the invariable custom to ask for a report from The Adjutant General, who gave the entire history as far as disclosed—the hospital report, the record of the soldier, and his efficiency, and so forth—and we printed that in the report to the House.

Mr. FIELDS. We do not consider a case unless it is accompanied by a report from the War Department as to the soldier's service. It is the positive rule of the committee not to consider a bill unless we have the military and hospital record of the claimant.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I do not think the gentleman quite catches my point. I am asking why the letter of The Adjutant General was not printed in the report. It would be an illuminating piece of information for the House to have.

Mr. FIELDS. As far as I am personally concerned, it was my intention to print the military and hospital record of each claimant with the report on the bill, but during my absence this was done, and I have not even seen the bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield? Does not the law which the gentleman from Tennessee has in mind relate to cases on the first desertion where the soldier has reenlisted and served for a period, as my recollection goes, of six months, and then was entitled to an honorable discharge?

Mr. GARRETT. In order to refresh our memories I have the law here, and I will read it for the information of the House.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, may I interrupt the gentleman one moment.

Mr. GARRETT. I believe we are speaking in the time of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. TREADWAY. Yes; I think I ought to be allowed to use a little of my own time. The chairman of the Judiciary Committee was very courteous in allowing me to take the time which has been devoted to his bill. If this discussion is to continue I feel that I ought, out of courtesy to him, to withdraw my request for the consideration of this bill. I did not think the bill would produce the slightest discussion. The report of The Adjutant General is absolutely clear, the Senate report is clear, and the House report is clear, and everything except the technicality that has come up suddenly is in favor of this claimant. I understand that the law that the gentleman from Tennessee is quoting is not applicable in that it does not apply to men in the Regular service. If we can not have a prompt vote on the measure I feel that I should withdraw my request for present consideration, but I do hope that the gentleman from Tennessee will allow these explanations to be made and quick action taken on the bill at this time. If the discussion is to continue any longer I must withdraw my request, and I ask for a vote.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts yield to the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. GARRETT. I had supposed, Mr. Speaker, that the gentleman from Massachusetts had surrendered the floor, and I was taking it in my own right.

Mr. TREADWAY. Can we reach any understanding as to how long this will occupy?

Mr. GARRETT. Unless I am more familiar with the 23 cases that it is proposed to present to-day——

Mr. TREADWAY. This is the only one I have to present, and if it is to be dragged on much longer I shall withdraw my request.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I do not think this bill ought to pass. I think the report ought to show that application was made under the general law and was rejected. It shows nothing of the sort. If we are going on, adding by special acts to a general law which was enacted at a time when there was every reason for the most intense sympathy, politically and generally, about these matters, I do not know where we are finally going to wind up on the question of the removal of charges of desertion. I have had case after case in which soldiers have appealed to me, to constituents of mine, to undertake to secure the removal of charges of desertion. I have invariably referred those cases to the War Department and have explained to these constituents who wrote me what the law provided, and offered to file their proof, and have filed their proof, when they have sent it, and had their cases dealt with under the general law. I have not been willing to make exceptions unless there was some technicality involved. There is no technicality involved in this case. This report states that this soldier served until July, 1865. The law provides that if he served until May, 1865, he could receive an honorable discharge by making application to The Adjutant General's Office.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a vote.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. TREADWAY, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

BRIDGE ACROSS NIAGARA RIVER.

Mr. SMITH of New York. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 17235) granting the consent of Congress to W. H. Crosby, W. H. Andrews, E. G. Connette, Daniel Good, Henry May, Robert C. Gaupp, Edward Kener, jr., William F. MacGlashan, and William A. Morgan to construct a bridge across Niagara River within or near the city limits of Buffalo, and for other purposes, with Senate amendments thereto, and move to concur in the Senate amendments.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the Senate amendments.

The Senate amendments were read.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, the committee has no objection to concurring in the Senate amendments.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the Senate amendments.

The Senate amendments were agreed to.

On motion of Mr. ADAMSON, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the Senate amendments were concurred in was laid on the table.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD in two separate leaves to print.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GRAY of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD upon the direct vote.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

UNIVERSAL TRAINING.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing therein a letter from his eminence, Cardinal Gibbons, on the subject of universal training, and also certain resolutions adopted at the meeting of the Michigan State Medical Society upon the same subject.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD upon the subject of universal training. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The letter and resolutions referred to are as follows:

CARDINAL GIBBONS FOR TRAINING—PRELATE ON EIGHTY-SECOND BIRTHDAY DECLARES BELIEF IN UNIVERSAL MILITARY PLAN.

"Cardinal Gibbons yesterday marked his eighty-second birthday, spent at the home of T. Herbert Shriver, at Union Mills, Carroll County, by declaring for universal military training as the best possible thing for America. He was in fine spirits and excellent health and expressed his views with vigor, brushing aside reminiscences and Mexico to tell exactly why universal military training would safeguard the Nation, keep it at peace with the world, upbuild its manhood, fuse its many foreign strains into one patriotic people and make it a Nation among nations.

"The deep-reaching effect of discipline upon the American character came first in the cardinal's mind. He recalled his school days—but only to state that the greatest lesson he learned was obedience to authority, the greatest benefit he received was discipline.

"'Order is the first law of heaven,' he said, 'and order comes from authority and obedience.

"'Obedience to proper authority is the first lesson in military tactics. It teaches the man that there is something higher than his own desire. It is not slavishness, but obedience God bids us give to those in authority over us.'

"The difference between savagery and civilization, he said, lay in development of the will, and discipline was the best developer.

"'The Word says that he that ruleth himself is greater than he that taketh a city,' he continued, 'and so it is with nations.

"'These camp schools make a man stronger, broader. They make him more patriotic and more fit physically, morally, socially, and intellectually. They take him from temptation of passion and vices and sin. They throw him in touch with men of other circumstances from other places. They make him feel there is something out there in the Nation which demands his loyalty and service. They bring the rich man and the poor man together on an equal footing and teach them they owe an equal allegiance.'

"Universal training would engender patriotism and make Americans out of Poles and Slavs and Sicilians quicker and better than any other agency, he pointed out, because it would reveal the true American spirit, show America was a Nation worthy of patriotic love, and prove that Americanism and commercialism were not synonymous.

"'Certainly man could not be asked to forget his love for the land of his birth,' he added. 'The poet said, you remember, "Breathes there a man with soul so dead who never to himself hath said, this is my own, my native land?"

"'But it teaches him his duty to the country where God has placed him. Like Ruth, he should say, "Thy people shall be my people, and thy God my God." That is a most beautiful story and a most profound lesson.

"'I was greatly pleased to see the bill introduced recently by the Senator from Oregon providing for this training. Such a system would be of immeasurable benefit to the young men of the country in every way. It would safeguard the Nation. It would not foster militarism. It would not be a provocation to war, but would make us strong enough to insure peace so far as humanly possible.'"

RESOLUTIONS ADOPTED AT THE MEETING OF THE MICHIGAN STATE MEDICAL SOCIETY, HOUGHTON, MICH., AUGUST, 1916.

Dr. C. B. Burr, of Flint, presented the following resolutions:

"Whereas military exercises in early life favor a large degree of mental and physical development, through quickening perception, improving organic functions, and developing muscular and bony structure; and

"Whereas marching under the flag of the country, the symbol of governmental authority, inculcates obedience, encourages loyalty, and furnishes discipline in self-control: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That the Michigan State Medical Society recommends universal military training and requests the Michigan congressional delegation to exert itself to bring about some effective legislation to this end.

"Resolved, That copies of these resolutions be furnished by the secretary to every member of the House of Representatives and the Senate of the United States and to the various leagues and organizations interested in the propaganda for national defense."

The resolutions were offered for passage by Dr. Burr, and were seconded by Dr. A. M. Hume, of Flint, who said: "We are all true Americans. This is certainly an expression of true Americanism. I second the motion."

Dr. L. J. Hirschman, of Detroit, who left the Plattsburg Training Camp to attend the meeting of the society, addressed the convention in regard to the resolutions, and extended an invitation on behalf of the medical training branch of the camp to all medical men of Michigan to attend. He said: "Outside of the physical benefit received, the patriotism that is instilled in the hearts of those who attend can not be described in words."

The resolutions were passed unanimously.

PRAYERS OF THE CHAPLAIN.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Speaker, I submit herewith a privileged report upon House concurrent resolution 28, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

House concurrent resolution 28 (H. Rept. 1186).

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there be printed as a House document for the use of the House of Representatives, to be distributed through the folding room, 55,000 copies of the prayers offered at the opening of the morning sessions of the Sixty-third Congress of the United States by the Chaplain, Henry N. Couden, the same to be compiled by the Chaplain, who shall have 100 copies for his use.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, if we are to put this burden upon the Chaplain, it really seems to me that we ought to pay him something for doing it. [Applause.] The Chaplain of the House receives, I think, a salary of $1,200 a year. I do not know, but I think that probably that is the total of his resources. He is blind and requires constant attendance. I do not think it would outrage the feelings of anyone if we were to compensate him for any extra burden that we placed upon him.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Speaker, I understand that the Chaplain's prayers are in manuscript form; that he keeps copies of them; and the purpose of putting in this resolution is that they may be authoritative and compiled under his direction.

Mr. MANN. I suppose that to be so. I was speaking theoretically about the burden. If anyone else connected with the House compiles something, we pay him for it. We pay $1,000 a year, and properly so, to the parliamentary clerk for compiling the Manual. We pay for extra servies performed by various officers, including, I think, the Clerk of the House, and I think properly so. I do not think this ought to be done in the resolution, but I think we might afford to pay our Chaplain in some way a little more than we do. I think everyone in the House would agree to it.

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARNHART. Yes.

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, of course I would have no objection to increasing the salary of the Chaplain if the House thinks best to do so, but I do not see any possible way of doing so in this resolution, or by amending it so as to provide for payment to him for compiling these prayers. I introduced the resolution, and before I did so I talked with the Chaplain, and he expressed not only a willingness but a desire to see this done, and he made no suggestion whatever of any burden that would be imposed upon him.

Mr. MANN. I think that is one of the beautiful aspects of the Chaplain.

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. I would have no objection to it.

Mr. MANN. He never has whined about what we gave him, or asked for more.

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. I have no objection to any increase in his salary, or to pay him for this work, but it seems to me that it would not be a proper place to put the increased pay in this resolution.

Mr. MANN. It would not unless we provided that out of the contingent fund he should be paid some sum for this work.

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. I am informed that the Chaplain in the Senate only gets $1,200 a year, and I suppose their salaries should be uniform.

Mr. MANN. I do not think that follows at all.

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. If the Chair will permit, while I have the floor I desire to express the hope that this resolution will pass, and without any objection. There is a great deal of printing done by Congress——

Mr. MANN. Nobody has objected to the resolution.

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. Of which three-fourths is never read, but is lost. I think every one of these books will be read, not only by one man but sometimes by a number of men, and I know they are very highly appreciated by the preachers of the country.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from Indiana one question about this. How much is the expense of printing these 50,000 pamphlets?

Mr. BARNHART. Well, $2,126.

Mr. HOWARD. How long has it been the custom of the House to print the prayers of the Chaplain of the House? When did it start?

Mr. BARNHART. Two years ago.

Mr. MANN. In the last Congress.

Mr. HOWARD. Did the Committee on Printing come to the conclusion that the preachers of this country did not have any originality two years ago and could not pray to God themselves, but had to have a pattern cut out by the Chaplain of the House to pray by? Is that the reason?

Mr. BARNHART. No; they did not.

Mr. HOWARD. Well, what is the reason, what is the logical reason, what good reason is there for spending $2,150 of the people's money to print the prayers of the Chaplain of the House? Who gets the benefit of it?

Mr. MANN. One of the purposes is that the gentleman from Georgia may receive the benefit of reading the prayers when he might be absent and not hear them.

Mr. HOWARD. I am here every morning and hear them. I am here——

The SPEAKER. One at a time.

Mr. BARNHART. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOWARD. Yes.

Mr. BARNHART. I recall distinctly that the gentleman from Georgia protested against the passage of this matter when it was put through the House before, and when I said to him if he did not want the documents I would like to have them, he said to me I could have them; but when I went to him afterwards and asked for them he said he believed he wanted them himself.

Mr. HOWARD. I think the gentleman has got somebody else in his mind; the gentleman has had some dream about my sending out the Chaplain's prayers. I have got real preachers in my district who know how to pray; they are consecrated men, and while the prayers of the Chaplain may be of some value here, I do not think they are of any value to send out. I have no demand in my district for these documents. The Chaplain is a splendid preacher and makes a fine prayer, and I hear them; and, as far as I am concerned, I think I will vote against this appropriation. I think it is a useless expenditure of money.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

FUNDAMENTALS OF A COST SYSTEM FOR MANUFACTURERS (H. DOC. NO. 1356).

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Speaker, I submit another privileged resolution, and ask for its present consideration.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 362 (H. Rept. 1185).

Resolved, That there shall be printed 34,000 copies of the Fundamentals of a Cost System for Manufacturers as authorized by the Federal Trade Commission, the same to be a House document and distributed through the folding room.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

A SYSTEM OF ACCOUNTS FOR RETAIL MERCHANTS (H. DOC. NO. 1355).

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Speaker, I submit another privileged resolution, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 361 (H. Rept. 1187).

Resolved, That there shall be printed 43,000 copies of A System of Accounts for Retail Merchants as authorized by the Federal Trade Commission, the same to be a House document and distributed through the folding room.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on House bill 2534.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, I make the same request.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

IMMIGRATION STATION AT BALTIMORE, MD.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to call up the bill H. R. 6034.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

H. R. 6034. A bill making available a portion of the appropriation for the immigration station at Baltimore, Md., for such counters, booths, screens, railings, seats, bunks, kitchen and laundary equipment, etc., as necessary in connection with said station.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from Maryland if this was provided for in the original appropriation?

Mr. LINTHICUM. This is entirely provided for. It is only a question of whether they are fixtures or furniture.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. These particular expenditures were not specified originally?

Mr. LINTHICUM. No; they were not.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Then the gentleman discovered he would have to do this.

Mr. LINTHICUM. The Treasury Department has decided that laundry fixtures, counters, bunks, and so forth, are not fixtures but furniture, and they have been contracted for, and in order to have the contractor begin before the 1st of October it is necessary to get this bill passed. No extra money whatever is provided.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. This bill is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to consider the bill in the House as in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 6034) to make available a portion of the appropriation for the immigration station at Baltimore, Md., for such counters, booths, screens, railings, seats, bunks, kitchen and laundry equipment, etc., as necessary in connection with said station.

Be it enacted, etc., That the act of Congress approved July 17, 1914 (38 Stat., ch. 152, p. 513), increasing the limit of cost for the immigration station at Baltimore, Md., from $280,000 to $550,000 be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to make said amount also available for such counters, booths, screens, railings, seats, bunks, kitchen and laundry equipment, etc., as may be deemed necessary in connection with said station.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word.

I think the pending bill is a proper bill, so far as that is concerned. The Baltimore immigration station is an illustration of what seems to be possibly careless methods of the Treasury Department. Under the public-buildings act of June 25, 1910, we authorized the purchase of a site and the erection of a building for the immigration station at Baltimore within the limit of cost of $130,000.

Two years thereafter, by the act of July 20, 1912, we authorized the exchange of the site they had already acquired under the act of 1910 for this immigration station for another site, to authorize the department to sell the old site and purchase a new one at a cost of $35,000.

By the act of March 4, 1913, we increased the limit of cost of the immigration station at Baltimore from $130,000, theretofore fixed, to $280,000, and authorized the purchase of a site and the erection of a building within the limit of $280,000. We also set aside a part of the Fort McHenry grounds as a site, authorized the Government to acquire an outlet from that site to the city streets, and sell the site that had been previously purchased.

By the act of July 17, 1914, we increased the limit of cost of $280,000 to $550,000. This immigration station has now had four acts passed and now requires a fifth. It started with a limit of cost of $130,000 and winds up with a limit of cost of $550,000, and in every case we have followed the recommendations of the Supervising Architect's Office in the Treasury Department. Yet every little while that office issues some pronunciamento telling how they are guarding the interests of the Treasury, and that Congress, the profligate Congress, is squandering the money. We were led into this with the statement that it would cost only $130,000, but are winding up with $550,000, it having taken five acts of Congress, following each time a recommendation of the Treasury Department, to do the thing that ought to be done.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Is it not quite the usual thing to have those increases in the limit of cost of these buildings? Does it not occur with distressing frequency?

Mr. MANN. We have increased the limit of cost on buildings many times where the cost of material has advanced, but I know of no other case where we have increased the limit of cost from $130,000 to $550,000. The first time we increased it from $130,000 to $280,000, and then from $280,000 to $550,000. I presume the last action is the correct action. I am not criticizing that.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I have in mind, I will say to the gentleman, one building that was authorized when I was on the committee, and we had the assurance that the original appropriation of $400,000 would complete it, but an additional appropriation of $450,000 was called for, and again accompanied by the assurance it would complete it, and then, after that, $160,000 more; and the original sum would have erected a house quite adequate to the public duties that were to be discharged there.

Mr. MANN. These changes have been made because the plans were changed. First, we were going to buy a site for $130,000. Then we gave the site that we owned and increased the limit to $550,000. But certainly the department that does it does not have the face to "cuss" Congress because we followed their recommendations.

Mr. BENNET. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. BENNET. I did not catch what the gentleman said was the original limit of cost of the building.

Mr. MANN. The limit of cost for site and building was $130,000.

Mr. BENNET. And now that has been increased to $550,000?

Mr. MANN. For the building. We have given them the site.

Mr. BENNET. That does seem an extraordinary increase. As I recollect it, six or seven years ago we purposed to give them the Fort McHenry site.

Mr. MANN. That is what we did.

Mr. BENNET. And they got $550,000 for a building in addition?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. BENNET. I will say that they have not fared badly, although in justice to the Representatives from that city, it ought to be said the need for a detention building there was about the worst of any city in the United States.

Mr. MANN. I think they need the building. I am not criticizing that.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I would like to ask the gentleman if he does not remember that that $130,000, the first appropriation, was not obtained by me, but was obtained for a hospital and not for a complete immigration station like the latter part?

Mr. MANN. The public-building act of June 25, 1910, specifically, in section 4, authorized—

The purchase of a site and erection of a building for immigration station at Baltimore.

I read the exact language of the bill.

Mr. LINTHICUM. The architect says the appropriation was merely for the hospital.

Mr. MANN. If the architect made that statement, he was mistaken; that is all. I am reading the language of the law.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I want to say to the gentleman one thing, though, for his information and the information of the House, and that is we changed it from $280,000 to $550,000, but we are going to turn back to Congress a part of the very substantial appropriation for the best immigration station in the country.

Mr. MANN. I doubt whether you are going to turn back anything. I doubt very much if you have much left now.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

CLARENCE C. KRESS.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (S. 3180) to authorize the appointment of Clarence C. Kress to the grade of captain, United States Army Medical Corps, and consider it at this time in lieu of House bill 7378, which is of exactly the same tenor.

The SPEAKER. What is the number of that bill?

Mr. RUCKER. Senate bill 3180. I will send this to the desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that the Senate bill which the Clerk will report shall be considered at the present time in lieu of a similar House bill. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint Clarence C. Kress, now passed assistant surgeon, United States Navy, as an additional officer hereby created in the Medical Corps of the United States Army, with the rank, pay, and allowances of captain, corresponding to the rank and grade in which he is now serving in the United States Navy: Provided, That for the purpose of determining his relative rank in the Medical Corps of the Army he shall be considered as having been appointed to the grade of captain in the Medical Corps, United States Army, as of the date of October 5, 1904: Provided further, That if promoted he shall be carried as an additional officer in each grade while on the active list of the Medical Corps of the Army.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from Missouri why this bill should be passed?

Mr. RUCKER. I will state the reason very briefly to the gentleman, and gladly.

Dr. Kress formerly had service in the Army and made an enviable record. He quit the Army in the Philippines and came back to Missouri on account of the serious illness of his father. Afterwards he entered the Navy, where he has made a splendid record, but it has developed that he can not stand sea travel, and becomes so seasick that he is unable to perform the proper duties to those that are sick.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I would like to ask the gentleman another question.

Mr. RUCKER. Very well.

Mr. SLAYDEN. When was Dr. Kress born?

Mr. RUCKER. I do not believe I know.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I know. He was born in 1884. I have a memorandum here which makes this statement of facts about the case, Mr. Speaker: That he graduated in medicine in 1905, and that he entered the Navy in 1910; that this bill gives him credit for service as captain in the Medical Corps of the Army since 1904, or one year before graduation; and as a medical officer at that time had to serve five years as a lieutenant, it gives him credit for service at the age of 15 years and 9 months, and this bill would promote him and jump him over the heads of 128 other medical officers who should be senior to him.

Mr. Speaker, with the record that I have from the War Department, I regret that I have to object to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. RUCKER. One moment. In the report on the Senate bill there is a letter from Surg. Gen. Gorgas, who has carefully considered this matter and recommends it. The gentleman from Texas is entirely mistaken about the bill giving this young man rank over the others.

Mr. SLAYDEN. This is from the records in the War Department. Does Surg. Gen. Gorgas give an unqualified indorsement of this bill?

Mr. RUCKER. Yes. He did so in my presence, and he does it in writing. I will read it to the gentleman.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I have this memorandum officially from the War Department.

Mr. RUCKER. The War Department favors this bill. The bill was drawn by Gen. Gorgas.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I have no reason to doubt the statement of the War Department, and I have no reason to believe that Gen. Gorgas favors this bill as it is.

Mr. RUCKER. As the bill was originally introduced, I will say to the gentleman, Gen. Gorgas did not favor it, but it was amended in the Senate to correspond exactly to the recommendations of the War Department.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Texas object?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Yes.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, may I have unanimous consent to temporarily withdraw the matter from the House?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks leave to withdraw it. It has already been withdrawn.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. COX rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Indiana rise?

Mr. COX. To ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of the budget system and the question of making appropriations.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana desires to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the budget system. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

REPRINT OF HEARINGS ON BILL H. R. 386.

Mr. RAKER rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from California rise?

Mr. RAKER. To ask unanimous consent that 2,000 copies of the hearings had before the Committee on Military Affairs on the bill H. R. 386, together with the bill and the report, be printed and placed in the document room of the House. The bill and the hearings and the report are all exhausted, and the first thousand will cost $13.92.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent that 2,000 copies of the hearings before the Committee on Military Affairs on the bill H. R. 386 be printed, together with the bill and the report. Is there objection?

Mr. COX. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, what is the purpose of this?

Mr. RAKER. The purpose of it is to have a reprint. The hearings and the bill and the report are all exhausted. There are many inquiries for these hearings.

Mr. COX. I have not had a single request. How much will it cost?

Mr. RAKER. It will cost $13.92 per thousand.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. CHURCH, by unanimous consent, was granted leave of absence for the remainder of the session, on account of sickness in his family.

PROMOTION OF EXPORT TRADE.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 17350) to promote export trade, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of House bill 17350. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUBEY] will please take the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 17350) to promote export trade, and for other purposes, with Mr. RUBEY in the chair.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, may I ask how much time has been used?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] has used 40 minutes and has 50 minutes remaining, and the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] has 90 minutes remaining.

Mr. WEBB. I will ask the gentleman from Minnesota to use some of his time, if he has a speaker who would like to occupy the floor.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MORGAN].

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I have concluded that the bill under consideration ought not to pass at this time, and that it ought never to pass unless materially amended.

The first section defines an association, which includes all combinations of firms, individuals, or corporations.

The second section repeals the Sherman Antitrust Act, so far as it applies to associations, corporations, or firms or partnerships engaged exclusively in foreign trade.

The third section repeals that portion of section 7 of the Clayton Antitrust Act which prohibits the investment of one corporation in the stock of another. The other important section extends the power of the Federal Trade Commission to deal with unfair methods of competition between corporations or associations engaged in export trade.

Those are the main features of the bill. Practically it authorizes and gives the absolute power to all corporations, large and small, to combine, to form a trust, in other words, to enter into a contract to monopolize business in export trade. There is no limitation. The proposition presented is that this is done for the benefit of small corporations, but it permits combinations of all kinds between our largest corporations.

As the title expresses it, the object of this bill is to increase export trade. We are all in favor of that. We are all in favor of increasing the export trade of our country. I am, and I presume every Member of this House is, in sympathy primarily with the object and purpose of this bill to increase our export trade.

I further agree that there is need at the present time that we should increase our export trade. Taken as a whole, I do not think there has been a time in a quarter of a century when our export trade was in so deplorable a condition as it is at the present time.

Our foreign commerce is in such a depressed condition to-day as to attract the attention of every lover of his country, of every man in this House, of the members of the Cabinet, and of the President of the United States. I do not wonder that our Democratic administration and the Democratic Members of this House should be seeking some method, some means, some scheme, some way to put our foreign trade in better condition. You are responsible for things as they are now. Therefore it is your duty to try to develop some plan to put our foreign trade in better condition than it is at the present time.

Mr. BORLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Yes.

Mr. BORLAND. Is not the gentleman making a rather extraordinary statement when he says that the Democratic Party are responsible for our not having more trade?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. There is no doubt of that fact.

Mr. BORLAND. Does not the gentleman belong to a party that believes in building a tariff wall around the country to keep people from shipping goods into our country and to keep out the mutual trade with other countries?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. I belong to a party that believes in preventing foreign producers from capturing our home market.

Mr. BORLAND. How does the gentleman reconcile the idea of surrounding the home market by a tariff wall, and giving it to special interests in this country, and at the same time gaining a foreign trade for the sale of our own goods? How can he reconcile those two doctrines?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. We have to look at facts as they are.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. I want to answer the gentleman from Missouri first. We want to consider the condition of trade at the present time. Does the gentleman from Missouri know that to-day we are doing business at a loss with practically all the foreign nations of the world except Europe? And does he know that in 1913, the last year under the Republican tariff law of which he complains, we had a net favorable trade balance with the countries outside of Europe of over $66,000,000? And does he know what the condition of our trade is with the countries outside of Europe to-day? Does he know that on June 30, 1916, the balance of trade with countries outside of Europe was against us to the amount of $247,000,000. In other words, under three years of your tariff-for-revenue-only policy, which opened our markets to foreign producers, we went from a favorable trade balance of $66,000,000 to an unfavorable trade balance with those countries of $247,000,000, making a net loss of $313,000,000 in one year under your policy.

Mr. BORLAND. Does the gentleman want an answer to that?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. No; I decline to yield for an answer——

Mr. BORLAND. I can easily give an answer to that.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. No; because I believe if I should yield long enough time for the gentleman to undertake to answer that question, he would consume all my 30 minutes——

Mr. FORDNEY. And more, too.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. And then he would not answer it. But that is not all. Take our trade balance with North American countries. In 1913 the trade balance with those countries was largely in our favor. But in three years—1914, 1915, and 1916, compared with 1913—under your tariff-for-revenue-only policy, which relinquishes our markets voluntarily to foreign producers, we have lost $520,000,000 in favorable trade balances with North American countries. In the same time, with South American countries, we have lost in our favorable trade balance $256,000,000. In the total favorable trade balances with North American countries and South American countries we have lost in our favorable trade balance in those three years $776,000,000.

Mr. CARAWAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Not just now. I want to give you a little more of this. Now, take all the other countries outside of Europe, and in three years, 1914, 1915, and 1916, compared with 1913, we have lost in our favorable trade balance $830,000,000. If you exclude Russia in Asia, we have lost $996,000,000 in three years. At that rate in four years of Democratic economic policies we will lose in our foreign favorable trade balance, with countries outside of Europe, an amount in excess of one thousand million dollars. No wonder this administration wants to get up some kind of a plan or scheme that will give us back the profit that we had in foreign trade under the policies of the Republican Party.

Mr. BORLAND. Does the gentleman still contend, then, that we are bankrupt? Is that his argument, that the United States is busted?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. We would have been had it not been for the war, which gave us a favorable trade balance with Europe. Take Canada. In three years, since 1913, we have lost in our favorable trade balance with Canada $296,000,000. With poor, downtrodden Mexico, which has been at war, in those three years we have actually lost $97,000,000 in favorable trade balance. With Argentina, in these three years in our favorable trade balance compared with 1913, we have lost $175,000,000. Think about that, $175,000,000 loss with one South American Republic! Is not that alarming? Does not that indicate something is wrong with the policies of this administration?

With Japan in these three years we have lost in favorable trade balance $85,000,000. Even with poor old China we have lost largely in favorable trade balance. Now, I concede that something ought to be done, but I do not believe that this bill is the proper remedy. Democrats here know that I have voted for many of the bills that they have presented during this Congress. I think some of these bills are excellent and that the party deserves some credit.

Mr. HASTINGS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Yes.

Mr. HASTINGS. Is there any bill that we have passed that the gentleman has not voted for? I mean the large, important bills. The gentleman voted for the child-labor bill, did he not?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. I did.

Mr. HASTINGS. And the rural-credits bill?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. I did.

Mr. HASTINGS. And the eight-hour law yesterday?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Yes.

Mr. HASTINGS. And the good-roads bill?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Yes. But I will tell the gentleman what I did not vote for. I did not vote for the free-trade-policy tariff bill. I did not vote, as my colleague and friend from Oklahoma did, to place farm products on the free list. I did not vote to place the farmers of Oklahoma and their industry—which constitutes the chief industry of Oklahoma—in competition with the farm products of Canada and South American republics, Australia, and Mexico. I did not vote to give the farmers of those countries free access to our markets, in free competition with our farmers.

Mr. HASTINGS. The gentleman from Oklahoma is in error. I was not a Member of the House at that time.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I am sorry that the gentleman was not.

Mr. HASTINGS. The gentleman says that I voted for that measure. I was not a Member of the House.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. If the gentleman had been here, would he have voted for it?

Mr. HASTINGS. I would; I think it is the best bill ever passed by this House or any other, except the rural-credits bill.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. And if the gentleman continues here, would he vote against repealing it?

Mr. HASTINGS. Unquestionably.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Then that settles the matter. The gentleman is a good Democrat, and there are other good Democrats here; but the gentleman will find that the American farmer is opposed to free trade in farm products. I do not know how you Democrats can reconcile this bill with the principles of your platform. This authorizes a monopoly in foreign trade.

Mr. CARAWAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Yes.

Mr. CARAWAY. Before the gentleman gets away from that array of figures that he has given about the loss of trade with South America, Japan, and other nations, will he please tell the House what law we passed that destroyed our trade with South America?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Well, you passed the Underwood tariff bill, which gave our markets to the producers from South America. From the day it went into effect imports from those countries largely increased. Ninety-four per cent of all the exports that come from six of the leading South American Republics come in free of duty.

Now, here is what the Democratic platform in 1900 says in regard to trusts:

> Private monopolies are indefensible and intolerable.

In 1904 you say in your platform:

> A private monopoly is indefensible and intolerable.

In 1908 you say:

> A private monopoly is indefensible and intolerable.

In 1912 you say:

> A private monopoly is indefensible and intolerable.

That brings it up to 1916. Now, for a quarter of a century you have been declaring that a private monopoly was intolerable and indefensible. And yet, under the dictation or suggestion from your Secretary of Commerce and the Federal Trade Commission, and possibly with the approval of the President, you propose to pass a bill which absolutely authorizes, creates, and encourages the organization of private monopolies. I say that there is not a Democrat here that can vote for this bill, unless he shall thereby renounce the declarations of his party platforms for half a century.

Now, then, we come down to the platform of 1916. For some reason or other the usual paragraph denouncing trusts and combinations is left out of the 1916 platform. I do not know why that was. I find that the word "trust," so familiar in Democratic platforms of other years, is not used in the Democratic platform of 1916. Here is all that is said on the subject:

We have created a Federal Trade Commission to take care of the perplexing questions arising under the antitrust laws, so that monopoly may be strangled at its birth.

Now, think about that—created a Federal Trade Commission so that monopoly may be strangled at its birth.

Mr. HASTINGS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Yes.

Mr. HASTINGS. Did the gentleman vote for the Federal Trade Commission act?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. I did. More than that, I will say that in January, 1912, I introduced in this House the first bill that was ever introduced here to create a Federal commission to have supervision and control over our large industrial corporations engaged in interstate commerce. This was six months before the Republican Party, in national convention in 1912, made a specific declaration for the creation of such a commission. The Democratic Party in no national convention ever declared for such a commission. In that matter I can justly claim leadership. I lead my colleagues in the House. I was in advance of my own party, and it was nearly three years before the Democratic Party fell in line. The leaders of the Democratic Party in Congress never thought of such a commission until the distinguished gentleman occupying the White House came down here with a message and told them that they must pass a Federal Trade Commission act. [Applause on the Republican side.] Not because it was a Democratic measure, not because it had ever been advocated by the Democratic Party, for it had not. The subject had never been mentioned in a Democratic platform or advocated in a national campaign by any Democratic leader. The Federal Trade Commission act is really a Republican proposition, and had our party had the making of the bill we would have passed a bill that would have given the commission sufficient power to have accomplished substantial results.

Now, going back to the Democratic platform of 1916, it says: "We have created a Federal Trade Commission that will strangle monopoly at its birth." Think of the little baby monopolies that have been strangled within the last two years. That is nonsense. There have been neither infant nor adult monopolies destroyed by this administration. And yet that very Federal Trade Commission comes before the Judiciary Committee and says to Democrats and Republicans, "Pass this bill and authorize the organization of monopolies to engage in foreign trade, to control the export sale of the products of our mines, our forests, our factories, our mills, and our farms." It is all right, the commission says, to organize monopolies to prey on the people in other countries. But these export-trade monopolies will turn and devour our own people. Strangling monopoly at its birth! I want to know what monopoly has been strangled under this administration. The very fact that in your platform of 1916 you have omitted the word "trust," that you have omitted the paragraph denouncing the trusts, and that you have omitted the venerable and oft-repeated phrase, that a private monopoly is intolerable and indefensible shows that the Democratic Party has been captured by the great interests of the country, and that to-day the very object and purpose of this bill is to try in some way to make the big business feel that it will be safe for another four years under a Democratic administration.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. LONDON. Has the gentleman prepared any facts to show that this bill will adversely affect the interests of the American people?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, if I had the time I could present many facts and discuss many points, but my time is limited. I desire to say, however, that I believe that a moral question is involved here.

I wish to present some statistics to show the monopolistic tendency of our commercial, industrial, and financial interests.

On January 1, 1914, the total capital stock of these corporations amounted to $64,000,000,000. The bonded indebtedness of such corporations amounted to $37,000,000,000. Their net annual income amounted to $4,339,000,000. The capital stock and bonds of these corporations amounted to $101,000,000,000. They paid a net annual income on their stock and bonds of 4.3 per cent.

The 1910 census report shows that in 1909 there were 268,491 manufacturing establishments in the United States. They employed 7,000,000,000 wage earners. Their products for 1909 were valued at $20,672,051,870. In round numbers, one-third of our manufacturing establishments employed 90 per cent of the 7,000,000,000 wage earners, and produced 95 per cent of all our manufactured products. In round numbers, one-tenth of our manufacturing establishments employ three-fourths of the wage earners in such establishments and produce four-fifths of the products.

To put it in a different form, 1 per cent of our manufacturing establishments employ one-third of the labor and produce nearly one-half of our manufactured products.

Some idea of the concentration of wealth is given by the report of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue for 1915, classifying incomes. The report shows there were 60 persons who had a net annual income of over $1,000,000; 114 who had annual incomes ranging from $500,000 to $1,000,000; 69 who had annual incomes ranging from $400,000 to $500,000; there were 147 with annual incomes ranging from $300,000 to $400,000; there were 130 who had annual incomes ranging from $250,000 to $300,000; there were 233 with incomes ranging from $200,000 to $250,000; there were 406 with annual incomes ranging from $150,000 to $200,000; there were 1,189 with annual incomes ranging from $100,000 to $150,000; there were 1,501 with annual incomes ranging from $75,000 to $100,000. There were a total of 357,515 who had an annual income in excess of $3,000.

I do not decry wealth. I have no prejudice against the man who has succeeded in business through honest methods. Indeed, I admire him. We could not be a great Nation without great business men. I believe we owe a debt of gratitude to the men who have directed our commercial and industrial forces with success. We must not forget, however, that dollar marks may be danger signals. We must remember that under modern conditions there is danger that our wealth may become too much concentrated in the hands of too few people. We must bear in mind that the modern business corporation is the most powerful instrument man has ever invented with which to make immense fortunes. Every large corporation that controls a large percentage of the production, sale, and distribution of any product in common use necessarily possesses a certain degree of monopoly.

For years it has been the policy of this Nation to maintain competition as the main factor in securing to the people reasonable prices. It has been a hard struggle. Progress has been slow. Monopoly is hard to suppress. To now authorize monopoly to control our export trade, to my mind, is a step backward. It is giving up the fight. Lincoln, in his memorable debate with Douglas, said this Nation can not remain half free and half slave. So our domestic trade can not remain competitive when our foreign trade is conducted by monopolies

There is a moral question involved. It is said England, Germany, France, and Japan authorize monopolies to promote their foreign trade. It is asserted that we must fight monopoly with monopoly. Secretary Redfield in his report, in discussing this question, uses this language:

The door, however, is still open to unfair competition from abroad, which may seriously affect American industries for the worse. It is not normal competition of which I speak, but abnormal. It is a destructive type of the industrial struggle, intended to put out of being the forces opposed to it that the victor may exploit the field at will. The methods used are not those of legitimate commerce, but those of commercial offense.

Secretary Redfield says these foreign concerns are not engaged in legitimate competition. If so, they are not using good business morals. What they are doing is in the nature of a crime, and yet this great Nation proposes to use methods and means of competition which we condemn in others as illegitimate. We must protect our own trade, but I for one stand for legitimate methods. Any other course reflects no honor upon our Nation or our people.

I do not believe that all of the great nations of the world, all of the great commercial nations of the world, should place their foreign commerce in the hands of monopoly and say, "Let the monopolies of England, Germany, and France prey upon our people, and let the monopolies of the United States go out to all the nations of the world—to South America, to North America, to Asia, Africa, and Oceania—and prey upon the defenseless people of these nations." That is not sound morals. It is not good business policy. I believe in protecting our own trade, I believe in protecting our own people; but I do not believe that this Nation ought to enter upon a policy which authorizes monopolistic combinations here in this country to go out and absolutely control the prices at which our products are sold abroad. For instance, take the farmer. First, we have the great packing companies, some of them with a hundred million dollars of capital. Under this bill they can combine. The great millers of the country engaged in the manufacture and export of flour can combine. The great manufacturing companies that manufacture the products which the farmers and the people of all classes buy can combine. When these interests are combined for foreign trade, they will not be very far apart in home trade. We must not deceive ourselves.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. For a question.

Mr. SLOAN. Why should not we exploit the markets of all the world, when we have recently invited other nations of the world through the Underwood tariff bill to exploit our markets? Is it not a matter of lex talionis?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. There is force in what the gentleman says, but what this Nation should do is to repeal the Underwood tariff law and protect our home producers, our manufacturers, our wage earners, our farmers, our producers of all kinds—protect them in our own home market, as we have done under Republican administrations. [Applause on the Republican side.] At the beginning of my address I spoke of the unfavorable trade balance and what we have lost. Go back for 38 years under Republican tariff policies of protection to our home market. There were but three years in which we had an unfavorable trade balance in this country, two of those being in Cleveland's first administration and one partly under the second. Go back 16 years previous to the ascendency of the Democratic Party to power in 1913, and during those years our favorable trade balance rose from $102,000,000 to $652,000,000. Then we changed our tariff policy, we threw down our tariff walls, we opened the gates, we relinquished to the cartels of Germany, the syndicates of England, and to the great combines of the other great nations of the world—relinquished to them, without price, without compensation, our markets, and what was the result? In less than six months that favorable trade balance, averaging over half a billion dollars annually for 16 years in succession, was cut down to nothing. Our foreign trade was profitable under Republican policies. It will be profitable again when the Nation shall once more adopt these policies.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has expired.

[By unanimous consent Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma was granted leave to extend his remarks in the RECORD.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. MONTAGUE having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had disagreed to the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate No. 1 to the bill (H. R. 15316) to provide compensation for employees of the United States suffering injuries while in the performance of their duties, and for other purposes, had asked a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. SMITH of Georgia, Mr. SWANSON, and Mr. BORAH as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

PROMOTION OF EXPORT TRADE.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING], and more time if he desires.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, this bill was introduced in the House on August 8, 1916. It was reported to the House by the Committee on the Judiciary on August 15, 1916. In other words, the Committee on the Judiciary, so far as the record shows, devoted seven days to the consideration of this bill. I wonder how many members of the Committee on the Judiciary were present during the consideration of this bill? I wonder how many hours they actually devoted to a consideration of this measure?

Mr. WEBB. I can answer my friend, if he desires.

Mr. KEATING. I would be glad to hear the gentleman.

Mr. WEBB. They spent the most of a whole day in hearing the representatives of the Federal Trade Commission. Mr. Hurley, Mr. Rublee, Mr. Morrow, one other gentleman, Lewis, I remember, and others, and the committee had ample time to discuss it very thoroughly. The hearings are printed, comprising, I believe, 60 pages. The committee was present by a quorum. I do not know how many, but there were as many as usually appear at a hearing, and there was a quorum at the passage of the bill through the committee.

Mr. KEATING. I have no desire to inquire into the secrets of the committee.

Mr. WEBB. There are none at all.

Mr. KEATING. But I would like to know from the chairman, if he is at liberty to state, if an actual quorum was present?

Mr. WEBB. When the bill was voted out of the committee?

Mr. KEATING. When the bill was being considered.

Mr. WEBB. I can not answer that. There certainly was a quorum when the bill was reported out favorably. My recollection is that we had the usual full meeting when the bill was being considered. I know we had a quorum at the beginning of the hearing. Sometimes members would drop out and then come back, and I am quite sure a quorum was present when the hearing began.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, here is a bill introduced into this Congress at a time when there is an understanding at any rate that new and important legislation will not be considered; when the House is practically in recess, when Members have returned to their districts to take charge of their campaigns with the assurance that no new business is to be put before the House and that the only subjects of discussion will be those which had been thrashed out when Congress was in session. At such a time this bill is brought into the House, is referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and that committee devotes an entire day, according to the chairman, to the consideration of this subject and the chairman is quite certain that when the committee convened a majority was present, but he is not at all certain as to how long that majority remained in the room and the witnesses who were heard were members of the Federal Trade Commission and practically no one else.

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEATING. I will yield.

Mr. DENISON. I understood the chairman to say that Mr. Rublee appeared before the committee. Is he a member of the commission?

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Rublee is legally a member of the commission.

Mr. DENISON. I thought he had been rejected by the Senate.

Mr. KEATING. Yes; he was rejected by the Senate but the rejection by the Senate does not remove him from the commission, I will say to the gentleman from Illinois, and he continues to be a member of the commission for a certain period——

Mr. DENISON. As a voluntary member, is that the situation?

Mr. KEATING. No; Mr. Rublee is not a voluntary member of the commision. The commission issued to Mr. Rublee by the President will hold him on the commission, I believe, until Congress adjourns, or to some such time. But that is not in issue here. He is a very distinguished member of the commission and a gentleman in whom I have a great deal of confidence. But the point I am making is, this legislation is entirely too important to be considered in this fashion. It has no place before this House. It should not have been brought before the House at this time and would not have been brought before the House if it were not for the fact that certain powerful interests seem determined to force through this legislation.

The other day an effort was made to bring this bill before the House by unanimous consent, and—I appeal to the common sense of this body—think of considering this bill by unanimous consent! Putting it through like you would put some unimportant bill on the Unanimous Consent Calendar!

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WEBB. I will yield the gentleman five minutes additional.

Mr. KEATING. When it was proposed to bring this bill before the House under unanimous consent a very distinguished Member of the House told me it was not expected to get this bill through the Senate at this session and suggested I should not make any objection. That very night in conversation with a distinguished Senator he told me he had been approached that very day in the Senate of the United States with the suggestion that this bill would be tacked on a bill then going through the Senate, without consideration, in order that it might be placed on the statute books, and the Senator was then told that the report of the Federal Trade Commission in support of this bill had not been printed.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEATING. I will.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Can the gentleman conceive of any reason why this measure should be forced through this House at this time when European nations are engaged otherwise than in promoting their foreign trade?

Mr. KEATING. Yes, sir; I can conceive a very good reason why it should be put through at this time and under these conditions, and that is because this kind of a bill, drafted in this fashion, without proper safeguards, could not be put through the American Congress after full, free, and open discussion in normal times.

Mr. WEBB. If the gentleman will permit, I desire to call my friend's attention to Document No. 426, signed by Joseph

E. Davies, chairman, dated Washington, May 2, 1916, transmitting to the House of Representatives and to Congress his report on the emergency and importance of the passage of this very bill.

Mr. KEATING. Is there not a long report recently compiled by the Federal Trade Commission on this subject which has not been printed yet?

Mr. WEBB. I can not yet answer my friend.

Mr. KEATING. What I stated was that a very distinguished Senator of the United States, approached on the floor of the Senate and urged to rush this bill through, had been told that the report of the Federal Trade Commission—the data on which they based their recommendation—had not been printed, but that the commission was prepared to submit its findings. And this distinguished Senator said he would make his own findings after he had considered the data submitted by the Federal Trade Commission.

Now, my friends, what does this bill propose to do? It proposes to suspend practically all the laws that have to do with the control of monopolies in so far as those laws apply to concerns engaged in export trade, with certain restrictions which provide that the Federal Trade Commission shall exercise certain jurisdictional authority. And we are told in support of the proposition that it should be rushed through, because the European nations encourage monopolies in foreign trade, and we should do the same thing. It has become the fashion in this country in certain circles to urge the American people to adopt these things that have been tried in Europe. The mere fact that you can place a brand on a law, or on a custom, "Made in Germany," "Made in England," or "Made in France" seems to be sufficient at this time to justify public men in urging its adoption by the American people and the American Congress.

Now, what is there in the record which Europe has made that will justify the American people in swallowing without investigation those commercial customs which Europe has seen fit to adopt? What has been the result of the adoption of those customs? Is it possible that the United States is in such a condition that it wants to exchange its present state for the state that prevails in Europe? We have peace, we have happiness, we have prosperity in this country.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. KEATING. We have reached that happy state by following American ideals. Why should we exchange them without investigation for European standards? I am not one of those who insist that Europe has no lesson to teach us, but what I contend for is this, that the mere fact that a thing is branded "Made in Europe" does not demonstrate it is a good thing for the United States.

Mr. BORLAND. I was going to ask the gentleman whether he argued we had no lesson to learn from Europe, especially in export trade?

Mr. KEATING. I anticipated the gentleman's question, and that is why I insisted upon making my position clear. I humbly acknowledge that we have much to learn from Europe, and one thing we have to learn from Europe is that we should not adopt the customs of other nations without proper investigation. It is proposed by this bill——

Mr. BORLAND. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. KEATING. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Colorado has expired.

Mr. KEATING. I would like a little more time.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. BORLAND. The gentleman is speaking of the customs of nations. He must recognize this is not a matter of customs but a matter of the working out of economic laws which are universal with all nations.

Mr. KEATING. I have a great deal of respect for the gentleman from Missouri. I recognize that he possesses an unusual intellect and a very broad experience in matters legislative.

Mr. BORLAND. I am glad the gentleman secured more time. [Laughter.]

Mr. KEATING. Yes; it enabled him to pay a very deserved compliment to a very distinguished Member of this House. Now, I want to ask the gentleman from Missouri how much study he has devoted to the alleged policy of foreign governments permitting monopolies in export trade?

Mr. BORLAND. How much?

Mr. KEATING. Yes.

Mr. BORLAND. Well, I have devoted considerable.

Mr. KEATING. Then the gentleman is probably competent to vote intelligently upon the pending bill and to decide for himself as to whether he wants the United States to depart from its established policy. Most of the Members of the House have given the subject no consideration.

Mr. BORLAND. I have devoted enough to know this, that we can regulate commercial affairs within our own borders, but when we go beyond our borders we must compete on an equality with our competitors or not compete at all. That is an economic law that we can not repeal.

Mr. KEATING. Well, I appreciate, Mr. Chairman, that in order to compete you must compete. That, of course, goes without saying, but it is one thing to say that you must be in a position to compete and quite another thing to say that in order to compete you must remove every restriction thrown about concerns doing business in the foreign trade, that you shall say to those concerns that they may establish such monopoly as they see fit. Because the object of this bill, the main object of it, is not to encourage competition, but to encourage and legalize monopoly. If that is not its object, then it has no object.

The other day the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary in response to a question from the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. FIELDS] suggested that this bill would produce more competition. That is not the object of this bill. This bill is to promote monopoly. We are told that you can promote monopoly in the export trade; that you can build up this Frankenstein for the export trade; that he will be a bad Frankenstein abroad, so far as foreigners are concerned, but will be a good Frankenstein at home and will not interfere with our domestic trade.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEATING. Yes.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I would like to ask him a question with reference to the merits of this bill. It seems to me to contemplate the creation of over-seas agencies for handling our export trade, and will place in the power of these over-seas agencies entire control and monopoly of our foreign trade along such lines as they may attempt to exercise the control. Will not the effect be to exclude from the foreign trade all American firms that do not submit to the dominion and dictation of these over-seas agencies and put the American exporter absolutely in control of the trusts which control our over-seas trade?

Mr. KEATING. There is a provision here against what is called unfair competition, but the purpose of this bill is to create a condition where there will not be any competition. The purpose of this bill is to create monopoly. That is the purpose. Of course, it is conceivable that a monopoly may develop competition; but the object of this bill is to remove the restrictions placed by the antitrust laws upon firms dealing in the export trade.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. KEATING. Yes.

Mr. WEBB. I certainly do not think I can allow to pass unchallenged the statement that the purpose of this bill is to create monopoly. The purpose is set forth in the report, which, I have no doubt, the gentleman has read. The purpose of the bill is to put American manufacturers and exporters on an equality with their foreign rivals in conducting their business abroad.

Mr. KEATING. Did you put any restriction upon their action in the conduct of their business?

Mr. WEBB. So far as their conduct does not affect their action in the United States.

Mr. KEATING. Certainly; so far as the foreign trade is concerned, you remove every restriction?

Mr. WEBB. Absolutely; because every one of the Americans' competitors has those restrictions removed.

Mr. KEATING. I do not agree with the gentleman on that point.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from North Carolina allow me to ask a question?

Mr. WEBB. Certainly.

Mr. HOWARD. My question is this: How far does this bill let loose these concerns on this side? I am not concerned with the situation on the other side. I am concerned with this side. How far does this bill let them loose on this side?

Mr. WEBB. It can not affect their action on this side at all. Their action on this side is restrained by the provisions of the antitrust laws.

Mr. HOWARD. Must they file plans and specifications not only of what they do here, but also of what they do abroad?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. HOWARD. Suppose half a dozen of these corporations go into cahoots for the purpose, we will say, of employing a selling agency at Paris to represent these concerns. How far can they go to combine to do that, and what effect will that have in this country?

Mr. WEBB. We provide very specifically that they must not restrain trade within the United States, and if they do it, they run afoul of the Sherman antitrust law. They must make a report and file returns with the home office, and they must do other things that are set out in this act.

Mr. HOWARD. I understand from the gentleman and I understand from a reading of the report that if exporters engaged solely in the foreign trade desire, for instance, to create a financial institution or certain agency——

Mr. WEBB. It is not a financial institution. It is confined to the sale and distribution of goods and wares and merchandise.

Mr. HOWARD. Would they be authorized under this act to create a bank, say, at Buenos Aires?

Mr. WEBB. Not at all. We have already authorized that here, by an act amending the Federal reserve act. The banks and all the branch banks in the United States can take stock in a foreign bank.

Mr. HOWARD. It will not affect these practices?

Mr. WEBB. Not at all.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit me a question.

Mr. WEBB. I regret I have not further time. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time, not exceeding 30 minutes, to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BUCHANAN] as he may desire to use.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BUCHANAN] is recognized.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, on account of the fact that I do not desire to trench upon the time that the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary has agreed to give me on this question, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD at the end of the time I shall use in making my statement.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, this question is one that I hardly feel competent to discuss in that lucid manner which the subject demands or be able to show adequately the vicious features that this legislation contains, in my opinion.

In order to come to the right conclusion on legislation of this sort men acting on it ought to try to understand what the trusts and monopolies of the country are. It has been said by able statesmen, and I do not know but what it has been made a campaign argument, that private monopoly is indefensible. If combinations for monopoly operating in the United States are indefensible, how are we going to say that they are defensible in operating and preying upon the people of other nations? What grounds or what justification can we give for passing a measure that gives combinations an opportunity to operate through any chicanery that they may adopt and use any despicable methods they may choose to employ against foreign people and we prohibit them from using those methods in this country?

But the trusts to-day, due to the fact that they have been given a free hand, are a combination of combinations. They take in the railroads of the country. In fact, through those combinations of combinations they have a monopoly of about everything, and they have exercised that power of monopoly in the way of increasing prices. They have made one increase after another without any justification on earth, with the exception that they have got the power of monopoly to increase those prices. The prices of the products of this country have not been increased in consequence of any labor costs and have not been increased in consequence of any other legitimate reason. Prices have been increased in consequence of the fact that the stocks of these companies have been inflated in some cases a thousand to one.

The Stanley steel-investigation committee disclosed that the directors of the Steel Trust, the leading he devil of the family of trusts, controlled transportation facilities capitalized at over $10,000,000,000. If that is true, the Standard Oil Trust and other trusts control the balance of the transportation facilities of this country.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. BENNET. What has the Democratic Attorney General done in the last three years to abolish any of these trusts and monopolies?

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Absolutely nothing. He has acquiesced in them by lack of action, as I shall show before I conclude my remarks.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. I will yield; but I would prefer not to have too much of my time taken up, because I agreed not to take up any more of the time yielded to me than was necessary.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois has consumed five minutes.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] suggested that I take as much time as I needed—not to exceed 30 minutes.

Mr. WEBB. Yes. I yielded to the gentleman such time as he might require out of 30 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair misunderstood the gentleman.

Mr. SLOAN. Does not the gentleman understand this bill to be for the interest and for the purpose of encouraging a class of trusts?

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Decidedly, as I understand it. I want to say, Mr. Chairman, that I do not pretend to have any monopoly on patriotism or on a desire to serve the people of the country; but sometimes I am at a loss to know why Members of this House for whom I have great regard permit legislation of this sort, and legislation such as extending the time to apply section 10 of the antitrust law to the railroads of the country, which, through interlocking directorates, make it possible for such trusts as the Steel Trust to control the railroads of the country. I believe that time has been extended until next April, and it was pussy-footed through here. I was sitting in the Hall when it was done by unanimous consent and did not realize what it was until after it was passed. That is the method that is being used to hamstring and chloroform these laws that are enacted to protect the people against these combinations.

Mr. BENNET. I will ask the gentleman if it is not also a fact that that provision extending the time when the prohibition against interlocking directorates goes into effect went through without a word of discussion or debate?

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. It did. In fact, half the Members did not know what it was. I asked two or three before I found out myself.

Now, in reference to the Steel Trust and other trusts controlling the transportation facilities of the country, which form a part of the trust, I want to read an editorial from the Chicago Examiner of August 21, 1916. It is one of the newspapers that, it seems, has not been coerced into refusing to tell the truth about the trusts once in awhile in its editorials.

Yesterday we passed a law to avoid a great calamity in this country. We were brought to that chaotic condition because of the arbitrary position taken by the heads of these trusts. If the railroad managers and the representatives of the brotherhoods of these railroads had been left free to act, without being directed by these big business crooks, things would never have reached that stage. This editorial from the Chicago Examiner of August 21, 1916, reads as follows:

A RAILROAD "MELON" AND WHAT IT TEACHES PEOPLE.

Not long ago the Pittsburgh & Lake Erie was crying before the Interstate Commerce Commission along with other roads of the Pennsylvania system for the privilege of raising its rates. It claimed that times were hard; that shipments were light; that the Government must take cognizance of the fact that wages had been advanced on all railroad systems and heavy expenditures for better and safer service had been insisted upon by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

As a result of these pleas this road, together with the others in that division, increased by public authority their freight rates by 5 per cent; that is to say, they were authorized to levy an additional tax of from $25,000,000 to $35,000,000 per year upon the business of the territory they served.

Presently came good times. Railroad business picked up.

So great were the profits rolled up by the action of restored prosperity and the special concessions made by the Democratic administration that the railroad was able to declare an extra dividend of 10 per cent.

But more than that. Lest it should be embarrassed in future by paying such heavy dividends, the corporation increased its capital stock from $30,000,000 to $50,000,000, distributed at a profitable price among its stockholders of record.

What will be the result of all this? Simply that when the next period of commercial depression comes, this railroad and others like it which have utilized the period of prosperity to enormously increase their capital stock will be unable to pay even moderate dividends on their colossal overcapitalization.

Again they will go pleading to the Government for permission to raise their rates. You will notice that now when prosperity abides with them they are not lowering rates. Not at all. They are "cutting melons" for the benefit of their directors and stockholders. But the people will have to pay for these melons. For just as surely as the pendulum of prosperity swings in the other direction the roads will be seeking the right to again raise their rates and plunder still further the people in order that the dividends on this watered stock may be paid.

If the administration at that time shall be of the same railroad-owned and railroad led character as the present administration that privilege will be granted.

It is an endless chain of railroad inflation and corruption, governmental stupidity, and public docility.

Our Democratic government at Washington holds the people's hands while the railroad plunderers go through their pockets.

There is but one fundamental remedy for this evil, and that is direct public ownership and operation of the railroads.

Mr. Chairman, in the main I am in accord with that editorial. For further information as to the practices of these trust-owned and trust-controlled railroads there is an abundance of information. I have included in the RECORD in my eight-hour day speech of August 11 statements showing where they have had a free hand not only to rob and plunder the public, oppress their employees, but also to rob the stockholders of the companies, as in the New York, New Haven & Hartford case, where they are now sued by the stockholders for some $203,000,000, as I understand.

But to show that this hyphenated Department of Justice of ours permit these crimes to be committed right under their nose, I want to read a letter that Senator THOMAS put in the RECORD on April 13, 1914. It is as follows:

"SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH, April 1, 1914.

"Hon. CHARLES S. THOMAS,
United States Senate Chamber, Washington, D. C.

"DEAR SIR: The inclosed newspaper clippings attracted my attention to a phase of Union Pacific affairs which seems to have entirely escaped notice. If my premise is correct, this matter is of such vast importance, particularly to the West, as to require thorough investigation and the application of a remedy, forever putting a stop to such practices.

"As I understand, the Union Pacific Railroad Co. is about to distribute to its holders of common stock as a dividend the proceeds of a bond issue.

"In 1901, immediately following legislation in this State legalizing such action, the Union Pacific Railroad Co. issued bonds for $100,000,000, to be used for the purchase of Southern Pacific. (See Mr. Harriman's testimony in case No. 993, in equity, vol. 2, p. 741.)

"Within the past year, by reason of the decision in that case, the Union Pacific Railroad Co. was required by the Government to dispose of its holdings in Southern Pacific, through sale of which it again came into possession of a large part of the fund created by the $100,000,000 bond issue.

"With the consent, as I understand, of the Department of Justice, this fund was then invested in Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co. stock which, it appears, it is now proposed to distribute, with the addition of some cash, as a dividend to holders of Union Pacific common.

"Apparently the Department of Justice did not look beyond the sale of Southern Pacific to ascertain the origin of the money invested in that property by Union Pacific."

My information as to that statement—and I receive it direct from the department—is that they did look beyond it and determined that they were not legally able or authorized to interfere with or direct the disposition of that fund.

"The fact that the bonds, which are subject to call in whole or in part at 102½, were not retired when the fund which they created was recovered through the sale of Southern Pacific indicates no present intention on the part of the Union Pacific to retire them. Up to December, 1906, $12,741,000 of these bonds had been converted into common stock, the authorized issue of which was increased $100,000,000 to provide for their conversion.

"Trans-Missouri lines have filed with the Interstate Commerce Commission, effective April 1, 1914, a tariff advancing rates to Utah from 5 to 20 per cent."

This advance, Mr. President, will affect my State quite as seriously as it will our neighboring State of Utah.

"In the interview quoted in the newspaper article herewith inclosed Mr. B. L. Winchell, director of traffic of the Union Pacific system, defends this increase as necessary because of interest on bonds which his company has to meet.

"It has been asserted by Union Pacific officials that the 10 per cent return which their common stock has been paying is not unreasonable; therefore, if they are to maintain rates on a basis which will give them this return and the bond issue is permitted to run for 50 years, which does not now seem at all unlikely, the people in the territory through which the Union Pacific system operates and where there is no potential competition to assist in holding its rates at a reasonable level will be required to carry the financial burden which the following figures show:

Original bond issue	$100,000,000
Less amount converted to common stock	12,741,000
	87,259,000
Interest on $87,259,000 at 4 per cent	3,490,360
Dividends on $12,741,000 common stock at 10 per cent	1,274,100
Annual charge	4,764,460

Or a total payment in 50 years of $238,223,000, with the principal $100,000,000 still due.

"It seems to me that we should not permit this condition to be fastened upon us without protest, and thus for ourselves and our posterity assume an obligation of over $300,000,000.

"I feel that, provided it is not already too late and there is any way to do so, immediate action should be taken to compel the Union Pacific Railroad Co. to now retire the bonds issued for a purpose which the Supreme Court has since declared illegal, instead of passing the money along to the pockets of their holders as a dividend.

"I am bringing this matter to the attention of yourself and a number of other Senators and Congressmen, whose names, for reasons which I deem sufficient, have been carefully selected, for the purpose of having the Department of Justice directed in the proper manner to take immediate action in the premises before this distribution is fully accomplished, requiring the Union Pacific Railroad Co. to use the fund now in hand to retire the issue of bonds which originally created it.

"If such a thing as justice exists, there certainly must be some way to thwart the avarice of this corporation and prevent the imposition of this burden of debt upon present and future generations.

"It is my belief that no Member of the Congress of the United States can willingly permit such wrongs as this to be inflicted upon the people of the country; that, realizing the importance of the situation, you will adopt such prompt, vigorous measures as may be necessary.

"I shall much appreciate an acknowledgment of this letter advising me of your action.

"Very respectfully,

"W. S. MCCARTHY."

"SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH, April 4, 1914.

"Hon. CHARLES S. THOMAS,
"United States Senate Chamber, Washington, D. C.

"DEAR SIR: Supplementing my letter of the 2d and referring to the attached article concerning the denial of the petition of the Equitable Life Insurance Society for an injunction to restrain the Union Pacific Railroad Co. from making the distribution regarding which I wrote you, here again, the origin of the fund in question appears to have been entirely overlooked. It is referred to by the supreme court justice as "accumulated surplus or profits," instead of as the proceeds of a bond issue, which it actually is.

"Please particularly note that about the time these bonds were issued there was also authorized an issue of $100,000,000 in common stock to provide for their conversion.

"The privilege of conversion at par expired May 1, 1906, but what is there to prevent a corporation which juggles its finances in the manner now under consideration from reinstating the conversion privilege at their pleasure. Consider that were they to now so arrange, the interest rate on the total amount would immediately jump to the 10 per cent they claim the right to earn on common stock, and the total amount of the obligation at the end of the 50-year period instead of being $238,000,000 would be something like $400,000,000, with the principal of $100,000,000 still due.

"When railroad companies which have hitherto been regarded as highly respectable and honorable are discovered manipulating financial affairs in this manner it seems time that a thorough analysis of the financial transactions of every railroad in the country be made to ascertain their actual conditions, so that when, as at the present time, carriers bring to bear upon conscientious public officials the pressure of perverted public sentiment in the effort to club them into submission and compel acquiescence to their demands reliable data may be at hand for the public information.

"Very respectfully,

"W. S. MCCARTHY."

I also append a clipping which accompanies this letter:

"UNION PACIFIC MAY CUT THE BIG MELON—EQUITABLE COMPANY LOSES ITS SUIT TO PREVENT DISTRIBUTION OF MANY MILLIONS.

"NEW YORK, April 2.

"Supreme Court Justice Greenbaum to-day denied the petition of the Equitable Life Assurance Society for an injunction to restrain the Union Pacific Railroad Co. from distributing, as a special dividend to holders of common stock, $80,000,000 in cash and stock of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad.

"The Equitable sued to restrain the railroad on the ground that the holders of preferred stock in the Union Pacific were entitled to share in the dividend or else have the $80,000,000 regarded as an asset and held by the road. The Baltimore & Ohio stock was acquired by the Union Pacific from the Pennsylvania Railroad in a deal whereby the Union Pacific released its Southern Pacific holdings, as required by the Supreme Court decree dissolving the Harriman system.

"It is understood that the Equitable will appeal from to-day's decision.

"In his decision Justice Greenbaum said:

"'If the defendant corporation has the right to accumulate a surplus, it has the right to invest that surplus in securities, and if those securities appreciate in value there is no reason why the profits should not be regarded as profits of the business of the corporation.

"'The agreement, however, reads that the preferred stock is entitled to no other or further share of profits than dividends in each and every fiscal year not exceeding 4 per cent a year, payable out of net profits. The preferred stockholders have regularly received a 4 per cent annual dividend.

"'To hold now, because of the unusually large or extraordinary dividend is declared from accumulated surplus or profits, that the preferred stockholders are entitled to participate therein would be to nullify and override the existing contract between the two classes of shareholders.'"

It shows that in the dissolution of the Union Pacific holdings by the courts they soaked into that company in watered bonds given to their stockholders $87,259,000, forthwith coming to the Interstate Commerce Commission asking for an increase of freight rates so that the dear public that we hear so much about here in this Chamber might be penalized to pay for the crimes of that company. I repeat that this is done with the knowledge and under the nose of the Attorney General.

Mr. Chairman, for fear you might forget it. I was indicted in New York last December for violating the antitrust laws. The charge in that indictment was conspiring to foment strikes to interfere with munitions of war in interstate commerce. If I had thought of doing that, I would have felt wholly within my legal rights. If I had ever considered or discussed the question of exercising my influence to foment strikes, which, of course, I would not do, because I would think it was improper, I would have felt that I had a legal right to do so, especially since the Clayton law was enacted. And it might be well for somebody to ask these great lawyers on the House Judiciary Committee whether or not in case this law passes it will exclude the labor unions of the country in their activities to better their condition, because it is very doubtful, under the present administration and judiciary of the country, whether they will not find some way to chloroform that law before they get through with it.

One of the impeachment charges that I made against Mr. Marshall was that he had refused to prosecute the criminal trusts. And, by the way, this splendid Judiciary Committee of the House, that we all admire so much for their ability and sincerity of purpose, after having enough information before that committee to convict that man of crime before a court of criminal jurisdiction and put him in prison, recommended to this House that there be no further action taken. I do not care to discuss that at any length at this time, however, any more than to read to you some of the evidence that was brought forth in regard to the trusts. It might also be interesting for you to know that during the time of this investigation the Department of Justice put every obstacle possible in the way of preventing the investigating committee from securing information; and when they were asked for the report of their special district attorney on the trusts they refused to give that report or any other information in regard to it. It might be interesting to know how this committee have submitted to all of that. I claim that that committee had a right to get every bit of information that they asked for; and without discussing the question of the importance of the information, I claim that a committee of this House should be instructed to exercise that right and not permit any department of this administration or any district attorney such as they have in New York to deny them that right.

Now, I am going to read to you from some of the evidence before that committee. In the first place they had a very able man, and I think a man who wants to please this administration and the trusts, as he very reluctantly put the information that he did put before the investigating committee, Mr. NELSON, one of the members of the investigating committee, asked him in reference to the Tobacco Trust:

Are they violating the antitrust laws in any form?

Mr. THOMPSON. Why, personally I am of the opinion that the Metropolitan Tobacco Co. and its affiliated companies were organized as instrumentalities for violating the law, and that they acquired and still retain an unlawful monopoly of the tobacco jobbing business in the metropolitan district territory.

Since that time they have had such a free hand in violating the laws that I am credibly informed that they are getting up a drug trust. As further evidence, the president of the Independent Cigar Dealers' Association, in New York, Isaac Ochs, in response to a question by Mr. GARD, fully corroborates the testimony of Thompson, as follows:

Mr. GARD. Have you any information relative to the connection of District Attorney Marshall with any investigation with the so-called Tobacco Trust or Drug Store Trust, if we may call them by that name?

Mr. OCHS. Only in the tobacco field. After the meeting in Washington we were invited, as a committee of the Retailers' Association, in New York, to visit the then investigating committee, composed of Mr. Thompson and Mr. Williamson. I personally was before that committee; they received my evidence. Probably it took three-quarters of an hour.

Mr. NELSON. What are the conditions of the tobacco business now compared to what they were before the dissolution of the so-called Tobacco Trust?

Mr. OCHS. Conditions, in my opinion, have been far worse.

Mr. NELSON. The independent suffers as much as they did before the dissolution?

Mr. OCHS. Why, if your honor please, they reclothed them [the trust] in such a way they had more power than they ever had before.

Mr. NELSON. Are there more independents, or less?

Mr. OCHS. They are being eliminated from the field in bunches. They are failing right and left. * * * Absolutely, in my opinion, it is only a matter of time, if conditions remain the same as they are, until the independent will be eliminated from the field entirely.

Mr. NELSON. What is the prevailing belief, as far as you have ascertained it, in the retail tobacco trade of your city, as to there being a trust—as to the efficacy of the dissolution of the Tobacco Trust.

Mr. OCHS. Why, the opinion of everyone that knows anything about it, or has made any study of it, is that there has been no relief.

Mr. John A. Locker, an independent wholesale jobber of tobacco in New York, who has been fighting the trust for years in the courts, as well as in the business world, testifies:

Mr. LOCKER. Yes, sir; I had an interview with Mr. Marshall, by request of Attorney General McReynolds, in 1913. I came to Washington to inform Mr. McReynolds of the deplorable tobacco situation in the metropolitan district.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. Locker, what is your conclusion as to there being a Tobacco Trust now, or not?

Mr. LOCKER. My conclusion is this, that the monopoly is being continued through the Metropolitan Tobacco Co.

* * * * * * *

The Metropolitan Tobacco Co. itself is the monopoly of distribution, and Mr. Thompson will bear me out in that. They have also been proven a combination in restraint of trade.

Testimony of Mr. Barnett Wolff, president of the Independent Tobacco Jobbers' Association:

Mr. CARLIN. With whom did you come in contact in making such complaint?

Mr. WOLFF. Mr. Thompson, assistant to Marshall, and by correspondent and personally with the Attorney General.

* * * * * * *

Mr. WOLFF. Mr. Thompson told us that he had completed the investigation, and had made certain recommendations to the department. In his opinion, he stated that he thought the Metropolitan Tobacco Co. was acting in violation of the law and ought to be dissolved.

* * * * * * *

Mr. WOLFF. When the American Tobacco Co. in January, 1915, shut off the market, then the Metropolitan Tobacco Co., in a large number of cases that I personally know of, came to a great many retailers and told them, "Now, we have you; you have got to buy American Tobacco Co. products from us." Statements of this condition were obtained, I understand, by Mr. Thompson, and verified from retailers who called at his office and submitted testimony.

On reading this evidence, Mr. Chairman, not alone because it is brought forth by the impeachment charges against Mr. Marshall, but because it shows that these trusts are combinations of combinations, and when you pass legislation here that restricts or that prevents the laws applying to the export traders, you are passing laws to protect the most powerful, criminal, and vicious trust that ever existed in the world.

These trusts know what they want. They started long ago to get a big battle fleet, so that they might back up their chicanery with the big guns of the Navy, if necessary. So, now, we are going to, as was indicated the other day when it was said that this law would pass 10 to 1, and I feel like I was wasting my time talking about it, because Members of Congress are not listening with open ears, but you are practically giving a letter of marque, a letter of approval, a letter of credit to a lot of big business corporations whose headquarters are in Wall Street, to go out and practice chicanery and these despicable methods of doing business on the people of the world, practices and methods that we have protested and undertook to protect the people of this country against.

I do not understand why they are so anxious to put this through at this particular time. They have certainly been given a free hand to violate the laws of this country, and I do not see why they have any fears of being molested if they undertook to do the same thing in some other country.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. I would like five minutes more.

Mr. GARD. My understanding is that the gentleman from Illinois was allotted 30 minutes, and I believe that time has expired.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. The agreement was Thursday last that I should have an hour, and I said that I would try and get through in 30 minutes.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, I have no objection to the gentleman proceeding, and I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have five minutes more, not to be taken out of the time already allotted.

The CHAIRMAN. The present occupant of the chair was not in the chair at the time the rule was adopted, but we are operating under a rule and the committee has no power to alter it.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I am willing to yield to the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, it does not take very much of an intellect in the consideration of this subject to know that these abnormally high prices are caused by combinations of combinations creating monopolies. These high prices caused by these monopolies, which they say is on account of the war, has cost the people of this country perhaps more than has been spent by any one belligerent nation in Europe. If gentlemen who are to pass on this measure will look up these things, if they will consider these statements I have made, there is no doubt that they will find that I have not had a sufficient command of language to picture these combinations as vicious as they are.

If you support this bill at this time, in after years when you come to find that this vicious trust which will be the agent of combinations and trust companies sent out over the world to do things that the law says are not permitted in this country, and when they come sailing back and ask us to back them up with dreadnaughts and cruisers that we have authorized to be built, you then may remember these few remarks I have made at this time.

It is high time that somebody was bringing to the attention of the country how these criminal trusts are permitted a free hand to go out and rob and conquer. It is high time that the legislators of the country were beginning to try through some force to direct the administration of the laws of the country and direct administrative officers to exercise their influence to prosecute the real criminals of the country, those who are robbing the people, instead of wasting their time prosecuting somebody who is exercising his influence for peace and in opposition to the despicable business of manufacturing machines of death to shoot down men who are our friends. When the people of the country wake up and understand all of these things they will no doubt see to it that there are men in the legislative bodies and in the administrative offices who will do their duty. I wrote a letter the other day in response to an inquiry of a friend of mine as to what I had done for the benefit of labor, and I finished up that letter by saying that the effort which I made, if successful, would have rendered the greatest good for the great masses of the working people, was my effort for peace and to stop the crime of this preparedness proposition, which has been clinched upon the people of the country, which is leading to the road to militarism, and militarism always destroys democracy. I am confident that when these matters are properly put before the great masses of the people they will take the same view in regard to these things that I do. I consider myself one of the masses. When I was elected to Congress it took a hammer out of my hand. I was working on the Northwestern station, Chicago, and I think I am as well qualified as anyone to know the sentiment of the working masses of this country.

The legislation proposed in this bill is based on a fundamental economic error. That error is that American export trade can be built up by monopolistic restrictions on trade better than it can by freeing export trade and commerce from all monopolistic restraints and restrictions both foreign and domestic.

Any export trade that is worth having can only be gotten because Americans can furnish a better or cheaper article than our competitors. Any export trade we can not win by that means we are not entitled to have and we do not deserve to get. Any export trade that we win by trickery, cheating, or fraud or other monopolistic devices, will be of no real benefit to American commerce and we are better off without it.

The idea embodied in this bill that we will prohibit American trusts from plundering our own people, but that we will authorize our Federal Trade Commission to license them to go abroad and loot all the other peoples of the earth, would be a disgrace to our statute books if it should ever become a law.

And, if the scheme were ever put into practice, it would come home to plague us to our loss and sorrow. I warn this House that these monopolistic trust craft of the export trade which this bill proposes to empower the Trade Commission to grant letters of marque for sailing the seas of foreign commerce, will gather with like predatory craft from other monopoly controlled ports and come sailing back armed with a double-barreled battery of monopoly, both of our export and import trade, and, as sure as the sun will rise to-morrow, these licensed monopoly pirates of our Trade Commission when they have organized the world trust in combination with like trusts of the other nations will parcel out all the countries of the earth among themselves, and these trust buccaneers of export trade which the United States Trade Commission turned loose to forage on other countries will come sailing here to lay all our ports under their guns, and lay all our hundred million consumers under tribute to their international combination, just as the world-wide war trust has levied its tribute of monopoly prices for war materials on all the nations alike for years past. The proof of this is piled high in the records of the investigations by committees of Congress, particularly in the Armor Trust and Steel Trust investigations, and should be ample warning to this House to set their faces like flint against any proposal to give governmental license or sanction to monopolistic trusts or combines by the plan proposed in this bill or by any other plan, whether it applies to export trade or import trade.

Private monopoly always means robbery of the public. It is undemocratic and indefensible from any standpoint. For our Government, whether by act of Congress or Executive permission, to license or sanction the operation of any monopolistic trust or corporation is to make our Government a partner in crime against the consumers, the great mass of our people. That is exactly the result and effect which would follow the enactment of this bill into law.

Another indefensible characteristic of this bill which shows evidence of a partnership between the trusts and the administration, which is now hurriedly attempting to force this bill through Congress, is the fact that while this bill exempts trusts and monopolistic combinations of capital from the provisions of the Sherman antitrust law, as relates to export commerce, it leaves the full force of the law to fall on any organization of laboring men who may be charged with attempting to restrain foreign commerce. In this connection it is significant that the only earnest and determined attempt by this administration to punish anyone by the enforcement of the antitrust law or to prosecute for the restraint of foreign trade has been against an organization of private citizens, the Labor Peace Council.

I want to ask the supporters of this bill the question: Supposing a labor organization were accused of restraining foreign commerce, this law would not exempt them, would it?

But it would exempt capitalists and corporations from the provisions of the law in foreign commerce.

Quoting from page 2 of the report accompanying this bill, submitted by the Judiciary Committee, we find one of the principal arguments proposed by the proponents of this bill to be as follows:

> We were cited to a large electrical contract in Chile about two years ago. The German firm or combination, during a period of three or four years, spent it is estimated, $60,000 in drawing plans and specifications, which were submitted to the Chilean people, while three of our concerns submitted three different plans. The exact amount which each of our concerns spent is not given, but it was three times the amount they should have spent in such close competition.

In reply to that contention I desire to say that if these electrical concerns pursued the same plan and policy in preparing and submitting bids to Chile that they were shown by the evidence secured by the Steel Trust investigation committee of this House in 1911 to use in making bids to the United States Government, then they would not need any common selling agency, because the proof taken by the Stanley steel committee showed that three or four of these big electrical corporations each submitted large sheets of specifications of supposedly competitive bids for supplying electrical apparatus to the United States Government, and upon investigation and examination of these specifications it was found that in the scores and hundreds of items on these large tabulated sheets the bids of all the companies were identical, even to the thousandth part of a cent, showing that these very electrical corporations which this bill now proposes to grant a license to operate as a monopolistic trust in foreign trade are already a monopolistic combine engaged in plundering the United States Government itself as well as the people generally.

In the third paragraph, on page 2 of the report on this bill, I find the following statement:

All the great commercial nations permit similar organizations to those allowed by this bill. Some of these countries grant additional advantages in the way of preferential freight rates for export shipment; direct ocean transportation controlled by powerful international combinations of foreign shipowners who discriminate against American shippers, and well-organized banking facilities to take care of their foreign credits with main banks in the chief cities of England and Europe, and branch banks in the chief countries where trade is sought. These banks give their foreign exporters information, finance their transactions, and give them every aid possible.

If there were any other reason necessary to show why this bill ought not be enacted into law, it is certainly furnished by this statement. For it is a fact, now conceded by all impartial statesmen and students of public affairs throughout the entire world, that the great moving cause, probably more potent than any other, which brought down on the people of Europe the monstrous and unparalleled calamity of the present war, was this very governmental fostered and aided struggle of the wealthy and powerful business combinations of those countries to monopolize the foreign trade of other countries through this identical scheme of government aided and assisted export combinations and monopolies which this bill proposes to fasten upon the Government and people of the United States.

I am at a loss to know, Mr. Speaker, why the administration should be so insistent in its endeavors to push this bill through so hurriedly and quietly, especially in view of the fact that some of the largest and most notorious trusts and monopolies of the country are now permitted to rob and plunder the people of this country of millions of dollars annually, unmolested and unhindered by our Federal Department of Justice. If these great monopolies and looters of the public can freely ravage the people of our own country without being called to account by our Federal authorities, there can hardly be any doubt but that these same supposedly servants of the people will unofficially sanction the monopolistic methods of these great combinations in plying their nefarious business and outrageous crimes upon the peoples of other countries.

Should anyone doubt the existence of monopolistic trust operations in this country to-day, and that within the knowledge of the officials of our Federal Government, he has but to refer to the hearings of the subcommittee of the Judiciary Committee of the House, investigating the impeachment charges against H. Snowden Marshall, United States district attorney for the southern district of New York, from which I shall read a few extracts.

In the examination of Assistant United States Attorney Thompson, who personally conducted the investigation to ascertain whether the Tobacco Trust was operating in violation of the antitrust law and the decree of the Supreme Court of the United States ordering its dissolution, we find the following statement on page 1024 of the hearings:

Mr. NELSON. Are they violating the antitrust laws in any form?
Mr. THOMPSON. Why, personally I am of the opinion that the Metropolitan Tobacco Co. and its affiliated companies were organized as instrumentalities for violating the law, and that they acquired and still retain an unlawful monopoly of the tobacco-jobbing business in the metropolitan district territory.

THE RAILROAD STRIKE.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting therein an editorial from the New York World of the issue of to-day, September 2, 1916, entitled "Put out the fire first," which expresses exactly my views upon the action of Congress of yesterday.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The editorial referred to is as follows:

PUT OUT THE FIRE FIRST.

"The people who censure Congress for hastily adopting emergency legislation to prevent a railroad strike are either fools or they want a strike.

"If Congress failed to rush this legislation through and a strike followed, these same people before Tuesday night would be imploring Congress and the President and all the agencies of government to settle the strike at once and on any terms.

"The most hysterical shouters for a settlement would be the members of chambers of commerce and manufacturers' associations, who so smugly deplore the 'surrender' of the United States Government to the pernicious demands of trades-unionism. The minute their pocket nerve was touched by the tie-up of traffic there would not be enough cars in the country to respond to their screams.

"These self-appointed critics of the President and Congress have caught the spirit of bluff from the railroads and the unions and think they ought to make a voluntary contribution of their own to the national store of hypocrisy and false pretenses. They are all very brave and resolute until the strike comes. Then they would be the first to run to cover.

"The immediate business of Congress in the matter of legislation dealing with this railroad situation is to pass the bills that will give the public guaranties that no strike will take place. The next is to prepare with due care and caution a code of legislation that will safeguard the country in the future. Congress is dealing with a condition, not a theory. The first duty of a doctor in an emergency case is to save the patient's life, not to prescribe a system of moral and economic conduct for him in the event that he survives.

"There is no reason why Congress should concern itself at this time with the wailings of the railroad presidents against the eight-hour bill. The railroad presidents helped to create this situation. They still want a strike. They would be glad to see every facility of transportation paralyzed if they thought it would wreck the unions. They have no more regard for the rights of the American people in this crisis than the brotherhood leaders have shown, and no tears need be shed over them because Congress is jamming an experimental eight-hour law down their throats. Any injustice that is done to their stockholders is sure to be remedied.

"Congress in this matter is on the side of the public, and that is where Congress ought to be. The advocates of delay are the advocates of a strike and of national disaster.

"It is silly to charge Congress with surrendering to the unions. The unions had a legal right to strike when the strike was ordered. There is not a line on any statute book which prevents their striking, nor could any law be enacted before Monday which would compel them to work. Whatever their moral guilt may be, they are within the law when they do the thing that they threaten to do. Therefore, it is the duty of Congress to take such practicable means as may be adopted at once to remove the excuse for a strike. Whatever further adjustments are necessary can be left for the future. That is the common-sense method, and Congress is displaying far more intelligence and patriotism than its critics.

"The rights and wrongs of this controversy are yet to be determined so far as they affect the railroads and their employees. But the rights and wrongs of a railroad strike so far as they affect the public are obvious and incontestable. A philosophic fire department might plausibly contend that its chief duty was not to extinguish the flames, but to frame a fireproof building code and strengthen the laws against arson. That would no doubt be an admirable public service, but in the meantime the building would burn down, the fire would communicate itself to other buildings, and a whole community would be left homeless.

"We prefer the congressional way of putting out the fire first, and determining later whether it was of incendiary origin or due to defective wiring, and whether the owner can legally collect his insurance."

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, I now yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. STONE].

Mr. STONE. Mr. Chairman, on November 7 the voters of the United States will pass judgment upon the national administration. It has been my happy privilege during the past three and one-half years to have been a part of the national administration and to have aided in the carrying out of its legislative program. I wish at the very outset of my remarks to pay full and ungrudging tribute to the leader under whom I have served. The fact that I am able truthfully to state that more great constructive measures have been spread upon the statute books during the past three and one-half years than in any other like period in the history of this Republic is due to the courage and the constancy of the great statesman and accomplished scholar in the White House. Few American Presidents have served during more troublous times; few have been confronted with problems that were graver and more far-reaching in consequence; and none has met serious conditions and approaching perplexing situations with calmer judgment nor with a firmer resolve to follow the principles of righteousness and justice. When history lists and records the names of the men who have unselfishly and effectively served mankind it will chisel high and in large letters the name of Woodrow Wilson. It will mention with grateful appreciation how he resisted the clatter and the clamor of the thoughtless and the frenzied and steadfastly guided the Nation along the pathway of peace.

It will tell how he stood at the gate of the Nation and denied entrance to the dogs of war and how, because he watched and waited there, the wives and children and sweethearts at the gates of a million homes need not watch and wait for fathers, sons, and lovers who will return no more. It will recite how when three-fourths of Europe was prostrate and desolate—where every mother wore the face of grief but stern duty forbade the solace of tears—the United States alone of all the great nations of the earth lighted the way of civilization and humanity.

The American people of to-day have reason to be, and in fact are, proud of the manner in which the President has sustained the dignity and prestige of the United States during the troublous times succeeding the outbreak of the European war. Problem has followed problem, all of them almost beyond the power of human faculty to solve, and yet as a result of his wise policy we are on friendly terms with all nations and in a fair way to retain their friendship, and we have their confidence and respect.

The President has interpreted to foreign nations the true spirit of the United States. He has made plain to them that while guarding its own rights the United States seeks no advantage at the expense of any other nation; that the United States is willing that the bright rainbow which spans its future shall bear its message of hope and promise to all humanity; that the United States has no ambitions that clash with the peaceful ambitions of any other nation. He has made it apparent to the world that this Nation stands ready and anxious to use its friendly offices in behalf of peace among all the nations now at war. Furthermore, he has made clear the fact that the will of the United States is expressed by intelligent opinion, not by shot and shell. The President, in thus showing by word and attitude the good will which we entertain for every nation, has reflected the real greatness of the United States and has made us more of a world power, a world influence for good, than could ever have been attained by force and arms. The good faith of the United States as an advocate of world peace is not and can not fairly be impugned. It is because an earnest zeal for peace is reflected both in the achievements and the utterances of President Wilson that the world looks confidently and prayerfully to him to utter the words and exert the influence that will usher in the time when all nations will observe and apply that beautiful sentiment spoken more than 19 centuries ago, when there broke upon the startled ears of Judea's shepherds, watching their flocks beside the village of Bethlehem, the only angel's song ever heard by the children of earth: "Peace on earth, good will toward men."

There have been a multitude of progressive and constructive measures enacted during this administration that will minister to the well-being and lasting prosperity of the entire country. The number of important measures is so great as to preclude the possibility of mentioning them all or of treating any of them with the fullness that I should like, but it is my purpose to partially review the record of notable achievements of this administration, and I confess a feeling of mingled pride and pleasure in doing so.

REVISION OF RULES.

The rules of the House of Representatives have been revised and liberalized so as to give the representatives of the people freedom of speech and action, and to eliminate Cannonism by making the committees of the House elective by the membership of the House rather than appointive by the Speaker. Under the present rules the business of the House is conducted with dignity, with dispatch, and with due regard to the rights of the entire membership. The present rules are infinitely preferable to the old rules under which the passage of a bill depended upon the autocratic whim of the Speaker rather than upon the will of a majority of the chosen representatives of the people.

PUBLICATION OF CAMPAIGN CONTRIBUTIONS AND EXPENDITURES.

A law has been enacted providing for the publication of campaign contributions and expenses, both before and after election, and to fix a limit on the election expenses for Senators and Representatives. All persons may now know who are furnishing the sinews of war to the several candidates, and no candidate for the House or the Senate can purchase by the corrupt use of money those honors which the people alone should bestow.

DIRECT ELECTION OF SENATORS.

An amendment to the Constitution providing for the direct election of United States Senators by the people has been proposed and ratified. What was a subject of discussion for 50 years has become an accomplished fact, and now no State will have to endure the humiliation, long suffered by Illinois, of having to stand helpless in the shadow of shame because of the corrupt action of its legislature.

INCOME TAX.

The Constitution has been amended to provide for an income tax which makes the fortunes of the rich bear their proportionate part of the burden of taxation and displaces to that extent the tax on the food and clothing of the plain people. The income tax now yields $140,000,000 annually.

CONGRESSIONAL INVESTIGATIONS.

Investigations of certain industrial combinations, including the United States Steel Corporation, the American Sugar Refining Co., the Shipping Trust, the Beef Trust, and the Money Trust have been authorized and directed. The information gathered in these investigations has enabled Congress to wisely legislate to check the abuses and to eliminate the evils in connection with the management of these great trade combinations.

The investigation by Congress of the Colorado mining situation resulted in the inauguration of such reforms in the management of the mines of Colorado as to have caused two years of peaceful, quiet, and profitable operation already and to have removed all likelihood of future trouble.

The investigation of the Mulhall system of corrupting and intimidating national lawmakers, together with the prompt and vigorous action of President Wilson in scourging insidious lobbyists from the National Capitol, has had a purifying and uplifting effect upon national politics generally and has enabled Congress to consider reform legislation unhampered and unembarrassed.

FEDERAL AID IN CONSTRUCTION AND IMPROVEMENT OF ROADS.

A law has been enacted providing for Federal aid in the construction and improvement of public roads. Seventy-five million dollars are to be expended by the National Government for this purpose during the next five years upon condition that the States shall furnish a like amount. Illinois will get $3,432,000, which will be supplemented by an equal appropriation from the State funds. The beneficial results of this legislation can not be overestimated. Improved roads will mean enhanced value of farm lands, increased facility in marketing crops at any season at reduced cost, the reduction of wastage from wear and tear, the promotion of a fuller and more attractive rural life, and will add greatly to the convenience and economic welfare of all our people. The policy inaugurated by the Shackleford-Bankhead law will eventually lift the entire countryside from Maine to California out of the mud and dust.

PARCEL POST.

A parcel post for all distances at reasonable rates has been established. This system has reduced the cost of transportation, brought farmers and city buyers closer together, to their mutual profit, and has forced the express companies to reduce rates and to improve their facilities and service.

In this connection it might be interesting to mention that the Postal Savings System, the deposits in which now amount to $100,000,000, has been greatly enlarged; that during the past three years there have been added 10,000 rural delivery routes and extensions, thus reaching 2,500,000 additional people; and that during the year ending June 30, 1916, the Postal Service had maintained itself and had accumulated a surplus of $5,742,445.

CHILDREN'S BUREAU.

A Children's Bureau has been created to investigate infant mortality, the birth rate, orphanage, juvenile courts, desertions, dangerous occupations, accidents, and diseases of children. Julia Lathrop, a coworker of Jane Addams, is head of this bureau. Congress does not have power to legislate upon all of the subjects which this bureau will investigate, but full publicity will correct many of the evils disclosed and will also cause the States to take legislative action.

CHILD LABOR.

A law has been passed for the protection of child labor. This is a great humanitarian measure and will correct an evil that has been tolerated too long. In the past thousands of children of tender years have worked in the mines, factories, and sweatshops of this country, dwarfing both their minds and bodies and putting them into their graves prematurely.

COMMISSION ON INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS.

A Commission on Industrial Relations has been created to investigate the entire subject of industrial relations between employer and employee, with a view of ascertaining the best methods of dealing with industrial disputes, so as to protect the rights of all persons directly or indirectly interested. This commission held extensive hearings and submitted to Congress a very able report, all of which has been published. This report and these hearings have been in great demand among all who would either by voluntary agreement or by legislative action improve industrial life and harmonize the differences between capital and labor.

WHITE PHOSPHORUS MATCH LAW.

There has been enacted a law prohibiting the manufacture of and trade in poisonous white matches. This humanitarian measure has served to bring about the extermination of one of the most loathsome of all occupational diseases—"phossy jaw."

ABUSE OF WRIT OF INJUNCTION.

A law has been passed to prevent the further abuse of the writ of injunction. The measure will remedy the evil of administration of injunction, as follows: (1) The issuance of injunction without notice; (2) the issuance of injunction without bond; (3) the issuance of injunction without detail; (4) the issuance of injunction without parties; (5) the issuance of injunctions in trades disputes against well-established and indisputable rights.

TRIAL BY JURY IN CERTAIN CONTEMPT CASES.

Legislation has been enacted which provides, under certain conditions, for a trial by jury and appeal in contempt cases, as in other legal proceedings. This measure conforms to a sound public policy to adjust the processes of the courts so as to disarm any legitimate criticism. The charges most commonly made, and which this law does away with, are that the courts under the equity power have invaded the criminal domain and under the guise of trials for contempt have really convicted person of crimes for which, if indicted, they would have had a constitutional right to be tried by jury. This measure, therefore, removes a cause of just complaint and proposes that popular affection and respect for law shall be the true support of every form of government activity.

SEAMEN'S ACT.

Legislation has been enacted to abolish involuntary servitude and brutal treatment of American seamen which heretofore had the sanction of law, to require sanitary conditions upon merchant vessels, and to provide for safety of passengers and crews at sea.

A law has been passed requiring that a wireless operator shall be constantly on duty on ocean-going vessels.

A law has been passed requiring the equipment of Army transports with adequate life-saving apparatus.

EIGHT-HOUR DAY.

Various acts have been passed giving the eight-hour day to those engaged in manufacture of powder and ordnance for the Government, to post-office clerks and carriers, to those who mine coal for the Navy, to certain female employees in the District of Columbia, to those who do work that is being done for the Government by private concerns, and to employees of common carriers by railroad engaged in interstate and foreign commerce.

MEDIATION AND CONCILIATION.

An arbitration act has been passed providing for mediation and conciliation in controversies between capital and labor, which has already been successfully employed in preventing great strikes that would have tied up the entire railway business of the country. This act provides for voluntary arbitration, and very recently a great strike was imminent because the parties could not agree to submit their claims to arbitration. The strike was only averted through the masterful efforts of President Wilson, together with the prompt action of Congress. Thus again there was given a striking exhibition of the superb efficiency of the present administration.

ALASKA RAILROAD ACT.

An Alaskn railroad act has been passed in order to rescue Alaska from the Guggenheims and to substitute control by the people of our natural resources for plutocratic and monopoly control.

There has been enacted also the Alaskan civil government act, which creates a legislature of two houses with authority to enact laws, thus granting to that Territory the fullest measure of home rule short of statehood.

AGRICULTURAL EXTENSION.

There has been enacted an agricultural extension law which will ultimately double the productiveness of American farms by giving the farmers directly through expert demonstrators the scientific discoveries of the Department of Agriculture and the State agricultural colleges. Three Government crop experts have been assigned already to the sixteenth congressional district of Illinois. These three experts have saved the farmers of this one district many thousands of dollars annually by instructing them how to prevent smut on oats, and this has been only one of many helpful activities.

Many important appropriations have been made to help the farmer, such as $600,000 to eradicate hog cholera, a disease which had been causing a loss of approximately $100,000,000 annually.

EXTENSION OF PUBLIC HEALTH SERVICE.

A most comprehensive and efficient health service has been established through laws resulting in the reconstruction of the public-health and marine-hospital work. A special appropriation of $135,000 has been made to enable the United States Health Service to check the infantile paralysis epidemic, which had become destructive in New York and various eastern cities.

DEPARTMENT OF LABOR.

A Department of Labor has been created, with its head a member of the President's Cabinet.

BUREAU OF MINES.

The scope of the Bureau of Mines has been extended in order to better safeguard the lives of those who work beneath the ground.

PURE FOOD.

The jurisdiction of the pure-food act has been extended to include meat inspection, and the pure-food act has been strengthened in other ways so as to have it conform to the decisions of the Supreme Court made since the passage of the original pure-food law.

CONVICT-MADE GOODS.

An act has been passed prohibiting the importation of articles from foreign countries made by paupers, convicts, and detained labor.

There has been other convict-labor legislation which requires the sale of convict-made goods to conform to the laws relative to convict-made goods in the States in which they are sold. There are many States which provide by their laws that all prison-made goods shall be branded as such, and yet when these goods have been made in one State and shipped into another for sale they have not been branded in accordance with the laws of the State into which they have been shipped; thereby customers have been deceived, and unfair competition maintained with the products of free labor. This legislation remedies that defect and removes a part of this illegitimate competition with free workmen and the manufacturers who employ them.

ANTIGAG LAW.

The pernicious "gag" upon post-office employees which, during the Roosevelt and Taft administrations, made it impossible for these employees to bring their grievances to Congress without fear of being discharged has been removed by act of Congress.

BUREAU OF SAFETY APPLIANCES.

A Bureau of Safety Appliances has been created in an effort to reduce the number of accidents to employees on interstate railroads.

EXTENSION OF INSPECTION OF BOILERS ACT.

A law has been passed extending the inspection of boilers act to cover the entire locomotive and tender, under which it is now required that all engines shall be equipped with high-power headlights. Other requirements conducing to the safety of travel are sure to follow.

HOURS OF SERVICE ACT.

The minimum penalty for violation of the hours of service law has been increased to $100, thus lessening the dangers of travel due to overworked employees.

APPEALS IN LABOR CASES.

An act has been passed permitting appeals to the United States Supreme Court by labor where labor laws have been held unconstitutional by State courts. Prior to this enactment, if the employer lost his case in the State courts he could appeal it to the United States Supreme Court, but if labor lost there was no appeal.

FEDERAL RESERVE ACT.

The Federal reserve act has been enacted, and, in consequence, the country has now a safe and up-to-date banking and currency system instead of the panic-breeding banking and currency laws which made possible the great industrial and financial disaster of 1907. The Federal reserve act is freighted with reforms and benefits. This measure will save the country in the future from the paralyzing influence of monopoly of money and bank credits and effectually prevent panics, which have heretofore threatened our whole financial structure. It removed the last obstacle standing between this country and a period of unprecedented prosperity. This law was designed to help all legitimate business. It will enable the farmers of this country to sow and to reap, with the confidence that money will be available for the profitable marketing of their crops. The manufacturer can enlarge his operations, with the assurance that from the Federal reserve banks funds will be forthcoming to successfully finance his undertakings. The merchant can liberally buy and sell, knowing that currency and bank credits can be obtained for all prudent and legitimate purposes. Under it we will have the assurance that largely the currency and bank credits of our country will be controlled by the Government and used for the general welfare. This law looks after not only domestic needs, but makes provision for the establishment of foreign branch banks, which make possible trade extension.

In June of this year the Federal reserve act received a strong indorsement from William Barret Ridgely, a former Republican Comptroller of the Currency, and known in Illinois as the son-in-law of the late Shelby M. Cullom, for 30 years a Republican Senator from Illinois. Mr. Ridgely, in commenting upon our present unparalleled prosperity and setting forth his conviction that it would not suffer any sudden or abrupt change as a result of the conclusion of the European war, spoke as follows:

We have cleaned house, paid our debts, and laid up a prodigious fund against future contingencies. Of almost equal importance is the improvement in our financial system, due to the establishment of the Federal reserve bank, which gives us the machinery and organization for utilizing credits and such a mobilization of our reserve money as to make impossible any such sudden derangement of our financial matters as we have frequently seen in the past. It was extremely fortunate that this reform in our financial machinery was in operation soon enough to be of assistance during the crisis brought on by the war.

BUREAU OF FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC COMMERCE.

A Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce has been created. Its purpose is to ascertain where and how business is to be gotten for the merchants and manufacturers of this country from every country in the world. Through commercial attachés, consuls, and special commercial agents in other countries and branch offices in 14 or 15 of the principal business centers of our own country information is brought to the very doors of the merchants and manufacturers, where they can have ready access to all the information which the department possesses. This bureau not only tells the merchants and manufacturers where the business is and how to get it, but seeks them out and tries to put the information within easy reach.

PENSIONS.

General laws have been enacted readjusting the pensions of veterans of the Civil and Mexican Wars according to age and length of service, and many special acts have been passed to meet the needs of infirm and helpless veterans for whom the provisions of the general laws were not sufficient. The average annual pension paid to the Union soldier under President Roosevelt was $183.73. The average annual pension under President Taft was $177.78. Under President Wilson the average annual pension has been increased to $226.53.

RURAL CREDITS.

A rural-credits act has been passed which, when in full operation, will enable the farmers of this country to secure better and easier credit facilities. The demands of the smaller farmers for productive credit do not especially appeal to the commercial banks for two reasons—the loans are small in amount and run for long periods of time. This law will meet the requirements of such farmers and will furnish cheaper money to those who farm extensively as well. Similar systems in foreign countries have done an enormous business, the farm-loan systems of Germany in 1909 doing a business of more than one and one-half billion dollars.

PROTECTION OF SEALS.

A law has been enacted to protect the seal herd of Alaska by providing a closed season of five years and strict regulations for killing seals thereafter.

PROHIBITION OF PRIZE-FIGHT FILMS.

A law has been enacted to bar prize-fight moving-picture films from transportation if they are to be used for public exhibition.

PROTECTION OF NIAGARA FALLS.

A resolution has been passed to protect Niagara Falls and to preserve its beauty as a great natural phenomenon.

ANTITRUST LAW.

The Clayton antitrust law has been enacted. This legislation separates the wholesome from the unwholesome, encouraging the one and preventing the other. Business that has grown naturally and legitimately will be protected and fostered, regardless of its size. Business that has grown unnaturally and illegitimately will be dissolved into its natural and legitimate units and will be thereafter required to comply with the rules of fair trade. Small concerns need no longer dread annihilation by large combinations through unfair agreements. The Government will take all business by the hand rather than by the throat, requiring only that the rules of fair dealing shall be met and that honest competition shall not be restrained.

FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION.

A Federal Trade Commission has been created. During Roosevelt's and Taft's administrations business men were constantly being arrested and politics was being played with American business generally. This all had a tendency to unsettle business and to injure honest business men, as well as to discipline the crooked business men against whom the suits were aimed. The Federal Trade Commision, in a fair, square, open way, keeps business men informed as to what they can and can not do. Thus business is encouraged and strengthened and innocent business men are not put under suspicion and perhaps destroyed by efforts of the Government to reach a violator of the law through the courts. The milder processes of helpful counsel are substituted for the harsh process of the law. Harmful agitation has ceased, corrupt business has quietly been weeded out, and all business has been shown the way that it can pursue with confidence.

WAR-RISK INSURANCE.

A war-risk insurance law was enacted at the outbreak of the European war. The war quickly disrupted all over seas commerce. Shippers were unable to insure their cargoes with private insurance companies. If commerce was to be resumed and continued and the United States was to be able to market its products, it was necessary for the Government to undertake what private citizens refused to undertake. Therefore legislation was passed to establish a war-risk insurance bureau in connection with the Treasury Department. This bureau has done a tremendous business, and, although losses have been abnormal because of the unusual hazards, yet the net profits of the bureau for the first two years were $2,237,859.

CONSERVATION.

Various laws have been passed to safeguard the interests of the public in the vast natural resources still in the possession of the Federal Government. The country is rich in natural resources—700,000,000 acres of public lands; 35,000,000 potential horsepower of hydroelectric energy; 165,000,000 acres of forest reserve; 53,000,000 acres of coal land; 5,000,000 acres of oil land; 3,000,000 acres of phosphate land; 41,000 acres of potash land; 14 national parks, aggregating 4,600,000 acres; 31 national monuments, aggregating 86,000 acres. All of this public domain has been wisely and carefully administered, land frauds and land grabbing have been reduced to the minimum, and the public interest has everywhere been recognized and conserved.

PUBLICITY OF NEWSPAPER CONTROL.

A law has been enacted which compels all newspapers and other periodicals to publish the names of their owners, editors, and lien holders, in order that the people may know what influence, if any, prompts the editorial advice which they read.

PHYSICAL VALUATION OF RAILROADS.

A law has been passed providing for the physical valuation of all railroads in the United States, and the work of making such valuation is now going forward; and when completed it will serve as a basis for estimating fair, just, and reasonable rates for transportation.

THE WEBB-KENYON LAW.

The Webb-Kenyon law has been enacted, which gives the various States complete jurisdiction over all intoxicating liquors immediately upon coming within their territorial limits, thereby removing all obstructions to the enforcement of State laws regulating the liquor traffic. This is a law-enforcement measure rather than a prohibitory measure. Since it was aimed at sales of liquor made in violation of State laws, it had the support of liquor dealers doing a legalized or licensed business as well as the support of temperance people. Certain distillers and wholesalers who wished illegally to supply blind pigs and speakeasies with liquors opposed the measure because it made it possible for local authorities to put an end to such illicit business. Theretofore local or State authorities were practically helpless in enforcing their antiliquor laws, because by importing liquors from another State a law violator could readily throw the case into the Federal courts in the event of seizure of the liquors upon the plea that an incompleted interstate shipment had been interrupted. Now liquors made and purchased in another State are put on precisely the same basis as liquors made and purchased within the State where the law violations occur, and all are alike subject to State laws enforced in State courts.

BUREAU OF MARKETS.

A law has been passed establishing a Bureau of Markets. This bureau will direct the farmer and the truck and fruit grower in scientific crating and shipping, and will give information and directions as to the best markets at a given time, thus saving millions of dollars to producers in avoiding glutted markets.

NITRATE PLANT.

A provision of the Army law establishes a Government-owned nitrate plant. The primary purpose of establishing this plant was to insure an abundant supply of nitrates for the making of explosives in the event of war. However, nitrates are devoted to another important purpose at all times. They are the most expensive fertilizer that the farmer has to purchase. A large surplus will be available for agricultural purposes from this Government-owned plant, and the law provides that the surplus shall be sold direct from the Government to the farmer.

GRAIN-GRADING LAW.

A standard grain-grading law has been passed under which a farmer or shipper can have his grain graded and guaranteed under the supervision of the Government and the grade fixed will be accepted everywhere as correct not only in quality but in quantity, so that he is sure to get his just reward for the labor bestowed upon it.

WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION ACT.

A workmen's compensation act has been passed providing for just compensation to men who are injured while employed in the Government service.

MERCHANT MARINE.

Legislation has been enacted which has already done much to build up a merchant marine, and the development along this line will be much more pronounced when the terms of the shipping law and other recent acts have been fully carried out. Twenty-seven per cent of our over-seas trade is now carried in American vessels as against 12 per cent three years ago. Two thousand three hundred and twelve ships have been added to the American merchant fleet during the past two years, all but 179 of which were built in American shipyards. More than 400 steel vessels are now being constructed in American yards which when completed will fly the American flag. This is the greatest number of new vessels under construction ever known in the history of the country.

It is important that we shall be freed from the uncertainties involved in a dependency upon foreign nations for bottoms in which to ship our commerce to the markets of the world. If present policies are continued Old Glory will soon float over every sea and beautify every harbor of the world just as it did in former days when Democratic principles controlled in the affairs of this Nation.

The shipping law contains a feature that is calculated to protect American trade and American shipping from foreign monopolies. At the advent of this administration almost 90 per cent of the over-seas trade of this country was carried by foreign ships that belonged to rings, pools, and combines. Now about 73 per cent of the over-seas trade of this country must be so carried. Between these ships there is no competition. Each combine is a complete monopoly. Freight and passenger rates are fixed by agreement, and dates and points of sailing apportioned. Thus the combines drive out independent shipping lines. The rates between this country and Europe and between this country and South America are exorbitant, and much higher than a fair compensation for the services performed. These combines annually unjustly levy millions upon American commerce. It is this influence that to a great extent has destroyed our foreign trade not only by exorbitant freight rates but by discriminating against us in all the ports of the world in favor of the products of their own country. The shipping law in one of its provisions undertakes to correct this deplorable condition.

FLOOD CONTROL.

A system of flood control has been adopted, and during the next five years $50,000,000 will be spent in protecting the Mississippi Valley from overflows. Often a single flood has done more damage to property, not counting the frightful loss of life, than it will cost to make the entire valley secure.

ANTINARCOTIC ACT.

The Harrison Antinarcotic Act has been passed to check what was a rapidly growing evil in this country—the drug habit. The enforcement of this law doubtless caused some hardships and distress at first, but most of even the confirmed cases were cured, and when the law is viewed in its effect through the long future it must be listed as one of the most beneficent and humanitarian pieces of legislation ever enacted.

TARIFF.

The tariff has been revised so as to compel the manufacturers to sell as cheaply to the people of this country as to the people of foreign lands. The Payne-Aldrich tariff law, the highest and most unjust, burdensome, and oppressive tariff law ever enacted in the history of the world, was repealed and in its place there was enacted the Underwood law, which substantially reduces taxes on the necessities of life. No special interest or lobby participated in the preparation of the Underwood law. It struck the fetters from industry and commerce and deprived monopoly of its control over production, distribution, and prices. Its purpose was to build business upon a firm and genuine foundation which will be unaffected by the winds of political agitation, rather than, as formerly, upon an unstable and unnatural foundation which was always threatening to give way and cause disaster.

The receipts under this law for the first 10 months of its operation was greater by $10,889,000 than for the same 10 months of the previous year under the Payne-Aldrich law, thus proving its superiority as a revenue producer.

The European war produced abnormal conditions, which made it necessary temporarily to adopt substitute revenue measures to take the place of what had been rendered inoperative by the war. The enlarged expenditures for the Army and Navy necessitated additional revenue receipts, and, therefore, the tax upon incomes in excess of $4,000 was increased, a tax upon inheritances of more than $50,000 was assessed, and a tax was also imposed upon war munitions. These taxes upon incomes, estates, and munitions enabled Congress to repeal the stamp taxes, which had proved to be vexatious if not burdensome.

The revenue laws have worked so successfully that at the close of the last fiscal year, June 30, 1916, the Treasury records showed a surplus of $78,737,810 of receipts over expenditures for the preceding year, and an unexpended balance of $174,965,231 in the Treasury, together with an additional unexpended balance of $61,914,359 to the credit of disbursing officers, making in all a total unexpended balance of $236,879,590, the greatest in the Nation's history.

Inasmuch as tariff rates are determined by a consideration of conditions in the countries from which we receive importations as well as by a consideration of domestic conditions, and inasmuch as the European war has greatly changed conditions in the principal countries of the world, it is admitted that a readjustment of tariff rates will be necessary at the termination of the European war. Information as to the changed conditions, as well as the tariff changes necessary to meet them, can best be determined by a permanent, nonpartisan tariff commission composed of business experts.

TARIFF COMMISSION.

A Tariff Commission has been created which will hereafter prevent the tariff from being used as a football of politics. The President has already announced his intention at an opportune time to send this commission to study trade relations between the United States and foreign countries, including the conditions, causes, and effects of the competition of foreign industries with those of the United States.

PHILIPPINES.

A law has been enacted granting to the Filipinos a larger measure of self-government and announcing the intention of giving to them full independence when they have demonstrated their ability to establish a stable government.

PREPAREDNESS.

Preparedness is the slogan of the hour. Although the United States desires primarily that kind of preparedness that counts in the production of cheerful, efficient, and peaceful living, yet she is mindful of the perils that threaten defenseless nations and desires also that kind of preparedness that will enable her to repel invasion and defend her homes and institutions from destruction. The appropriations for the various phases of our national defense during the present session are as follows:

Army	$267,596,530
Navy	313,384,389
Fortifications	25,147,550
Military Academy	1,225,043
Army and Navy deficiency	34,523,000
Nitrate plant	20,000,000
Total	662,476,512

This total is $403,710,421 more than was voted for defense last year, and the amount voted last year exceeded all previous appropriations.

This expenditure for purposes of national defense is the greatest ever made by any nation when at peace.

The highest military and naval intelligence in the world has outlined the entire program. Extensive hearings, covering many thousands of pages when printed, were held in order to get the most scientific information in regard to what was required to make this country able to repulse all possible assaults. Our already efficient Navy will be enlarged by the addition of 4 superdreadnaughts, at $11,500,000 each; 4 battle cruisers, at $16,500,000 each; 4 scout cruisers, at $5,000,000 each; 20 torpedo-boat destroyers, at $1,200,000 each; 3 fleet submarines, at $1,200,000 each; 27 coast submarines, at $700,000 each; 1 submarine with Neff propulsion, $250,000; 1 fuel ship, at $1,500,000; 1 hospital ship, at $2,350,000; 1 ammunition ship, at $2,350,000; and 1 gunboat, at $860,000, making a total of 67 vessels. The law adopts a three-year building program, or 157 vessels in three years. When this program is completed the United States will have 578 fighting ships in her Navy.

Also there are appropriations of $3,500,000 for aeroplanes for the Navy, $19,485,500 for ammunition, and $1,800,000 for smokeless powder, besides a multitude of lesser appropriations to provide important needs of a first-class Navy. Twenty-three thousand two hundred enlisted men have been added to the Navy in this latest law, and 5,000 enlisted men have been added to the Marine Corps, with provision for ample reserves.

This program will restore the Navy of the United States to second place among the world's navies, a place she proudly held until 1908, when, owing to the do-nothing policy of President Roosevelt, it began to decline relatively by dropping to third place. It will be remember that in 1905 President Roosevelt addressed Congress as follows:

It does not seem to me necessary, however, that the Navy should—at least, in the immediate future—be increased beyond the present number of units. What is now clearly necessary is to substitute efficient for inefficient units as the latter become worn out or as it becomes apparent that they are useless.

Also, he addressed Congress in 1906 as follows:

I do not ask that we continue to increase our Navy. I ask merely that it be maintained at its present strength.

It must be confessed that it required a number of years to overcome the blight of these recommendations. Congressmen had assumed positions before the public because of them that they could not readily change. It is true that President Roosevelt, in the closing year of his administration, suggested an increase in the Navy, but he did nothing to translate his words into deeds.

President Taft, in his first message to Congress, made the following statement:

Owing to the necessity for economy in expenditures, I have directed the curtailment of recommendations for naval appropriations so that they are thirty-eight millions less than the corresponding estimates of last year.

He did not change his attitude during his term. It was not until Woodrow Wilson assumed the Presidency that there was an escape from the lethargy and neglect in dealing with the United States Navy. More has been accomplished toward making the United States Navy an efficient fighting navy during the past three years than had been accomplished during the previous 12 years. More was accomplished during the first two years of this administration than was accomplished during the four years of Taft or the seven and a half years of Roosevelt.

Admiral Fletcher, commander in chief of the Atlantic Fleet, on March 2, 1916, before the House Committee on Naval Affairs said:

The ships of our Navy compare favorably with ships of similar types of any other navy, and it is believed they are slightly superior. It has been the policy in this country to build ships of a little greater displacement and a little greater power than similar ships abroad, laid down or appropriated for at the same time.

This policy of the United States to build superior vessels, which Admiral Fletcher mentions, is illustrated by the class of battle cruisers provided for in the naval law passed this session. The best battle cruiser that Germany possesses has about 53,000 horsepower and travels 26 knots an hour. The best battle cruiser that England possesses has about 80,000 horsepower and travels 29 knots an hour. The four battle cruisers ordered this year by Congress are to have 180,000 horsepower and will travel 36 knots an hour.

Admiral Dewey recently issued a statement in reply to the critics who during the past two years have been holding the Navy of the United States up to the scorn of the world. The statement refers to the condition of the Navy, without the extensive additions recently authorized.

The attacks that have been made upon the Navy are as false as many of them are shameful. It is not a junk heap. There is no demoralization. Both in matériel and personnel we are more efficient to-day than ever before. Our ships are as good as any, our officers are as good as any, and our enlisted men are the finest in the world.

Then speaking of what the present Secretary of the Navy had done, he said:

Facts and figures tell their own story. The navy was 5,000 short of the number of enlisted men allowed by law; over 6,000 have been added, although more rigid examinations have forced the rejection of five out of every six. Only 52 per cent of honorably discharged seamen were reenlisting. For more than a year about 90 per cent have reenlisted. Desertions have been cut in half and discipline has been improved to the extent that has permitted the restoration of a prison ship and a disciplinary barracks to normal uses. No, sir; the Navy is not demoralized, and those who make the charge are guilty of falsehood and misrepresentation.

The Army appropriation law provides $13,281,666 for aeroplanes, $6,000,000 for machine guns for the Regular Army and $6,000,000 for machine guns for the National Guard, $10,000,000 for field artillery for the National Guard, $10,000,000 for field-artillery ammunition for the National Guard, $5,000,000 for rifles, $10,000,000 for reserve small-arm ammunition, $3,000,000 for target-practice munitions, $500,000 for armed motor cars, and ample amounts for many other important purposes.

The size of the Regular Army has been fixed at 296,461 men as a maximum basis and 215,838 as a minimum basis. The National Guard has been increased to 458,000 men and has been federalized—that is, placed under Federal control. This means that hereafter the National Guard will be thoroughly equipped by the National Government and trained by Regular Army officers. A short time is sure to convert the National Guard into a well-organized, well-drilled, well-equipped fighting force. This action of the present administration is greatly in contrast with the action of Roosevelt in reducing the Regular Army 14,000 during his administration.

Our seacoast defenses are now said by the Chief of the Coast Artillery to be the best in the world. However, the present Congress has made greatly enlarged appropriations to extend them and to increase their efficiency. One million two hundred and eighty-four thousand five hundred dollars has been appropriated for seacoast cannon and authority given to the Secretary of War to contract for $3,000,000 more; $3,000,000 has been appropriated for ammunition for seacoast cannon and authority given to the Secretary of War to contract for $3,500,000 more; $2,821,500 has been appropriated for mountain, field, and siege cannon and authority given to the Secretary of War to contract for $3,500,000 more; $2,700,000 has been appropriated for ammunition for mountain, field, and siege cannon and authority given to the Secretary of War to contract for $1,500,000 more; and equally generous provision has been made for other important purposes too numerous to mention.

The number of cadets at both Annapolis and West Point has been doubled, so as to provide plenty of well-trained officers for both the Army and the Navy.

A feature of all the preparedness measures is ample provision for providing dies, gauges, jigs, tools, and so forth, to furnish private manufacturers in case of war, so that they can quickly convert their plants into munition-making plants. This will avert delay in getting ready to furnish a constant and sufficient supply of arms and ammunition in case of a conflict calling for more than the enormous stores now ready.

Also, a council of national defense has been established for the purpose of coordinating our industries and resources for the national security and welfare. Already a comprehensive survey of the United States has been made, so that the War and Navy Departments know just what every factory can furnish, if required to do so, and just where to look for every item needed in the conduct of war. Not even the marvelous organization of Germany along these lines will be superior to the organization which the United States is now perfecting.

The foregoing preparedness measures called for an increase of appropriations greater than the whole cost of the Panama Canal, and yet it is the intention to meet these enlarged expenditures with current revenue receipts. The construction of the Panama Canal covered a period of 12 years, but the Republicans continued to issue bonds to meet the yearly outlays. It was only when the Democrats gained control of Congress that Panama Canal payments were met without resort to bonds.

PEACE COMMISSION.

The naval appropriation law contains a provision establishing a peace commission that should be of interest to the entire world. The whole provision so clearly and forcibly expresses what undoubtedly is the sentiment of the people of the United States on this subject that it will be well to quote it in full. It is as follows:

It is hereby declared to be the policy of the United States to adjust and settle its international disputes through mediation or arbitration, to the end that war may be honorably avoided. It looks with apprehension and disfavor upon a general increase of armament throughout the world, but it realizes that no single nation can disarm, and that without a common agreement upon the subject every considerable power must maintain a relative standing in military strength.

In view of the premises, the President is authorized and requested to invite, at an appropriate time, not later than the close of the war in Europe all the great Governments of the world to send representatives to a conference which shall be charged with the duty of formulating a plan for a court of arbitration or other tribunal to which disputed questions between nations shall be referred for adjudication and peaceful settlement and to consider the question of disarmament, and submit their recommendations to their respective Governments for approval. The President is hereby authorized to appoint nine citizens of the United States who, in his judgment, shall be qualified for such duty to be representatives of the United States in such a conference.

When it is remembered that thus far in the European war 10,000,000 strong men have been either killed or crippled for life, and that, according to the foremost European statisticians, such as Edgar Crammond, of England; Henri Masson, of Belgium; Yves Guyot, of France; M. Barriol, of Russia; Von Renault and Riesser, of Germany; and the Austrian minister of national defense, it has cost directly and indirectly $110,000,000,000, not counting the property loss, it should not require further argument to uphold the policy of peaceful settlement of disputes for which Congress has declared.

The horror, the cost, the miseries and sufferings and brutality of war can not be described nor imagined. Gloss war over as we will by tales of heroic deeds and glorious victories, mingle with shot and shell the waving of banners and the strains of martial music, yet we can not distract attention from its barbarous cruelty and its wanton waste of property and life.

We are all proud of the fact that there is fire in our veins. We are inspired by the thought that we come from an ancestry whose indomitable spirit won many a glorious victory. We never neglect to celebrate their fortitude, their self-sacrifice, and their high courage whenever the storm of war was upon them. Just as with our ancestors, Americans of to-day are unacquainted with fear. If duty called they would perform deeds of heroism upon the battle field worthy of our most noble sires. But we are also a people noted for self-restraint. We recognize that rashness is to be rated with cowardice as an evil to be avoided. Our national conscience tells us that the cry of right and truth and justice is for peace, not for war. The shrieks of the mangled and the dying on European battle fields have filled us with a determination to make peace first the controlling sentiment and law of this country and then of the world. We have resolved to make our own life and practices fit and recommend us for this high mission. The prayer that is going up constantly from every American hamlet and fireside is that of George Willard Bonte:

God of our fathers, intervene;
Stretch forth Thy staying hands;
Blood of our brothers flows between
The bounds of kindred lands,
And tears, oh the tears of mothers and wives,
Are rusting the blades of our harvest knives'
God of our fathers, grant us peace—
Smother the fiery brands.

Christ, Lord and Master, Prince of Peace,
Vanquish the god of war.
Bid the red clouds of rage surcease
Where mad iron eagles soar.
Silence the blasts of the hellish siege guns—
Boasting the slaying of thousands of sons;
Christ, Lord and Master, heal our wounds—
Silence the battle's roar.

Lord of the Nations, bring us years
Of peace, good will, and toil;
Lead us from out this vale of tears—
Bless Thou the corpse-strewn soil.
End the wild orgy of carnage and hate;
Steer to safe harbors the wrecked ships of state;
Lord of the Nations, hear our prayer—
Quiet the world's turmoil.

When the European war is finally terminated it is unlikely that any of the nations involved will be eager to enter another war. Their sorrows will be so acute, they will be so overwhelmed with war debts, and will have such a burden of legless, armless, and sightless men that they will be both unable and disinclined to engage in another war for a number of generations. Why not make peace permanent? The Peace Commission which Congress has recently created is a long step in that direction.

ECONOMY.

An examination of the record will reveal the fact, and it is an easily demonstrable fact, that a wiser and more rigid economy was never practiced by any other administration. The record of the past three years in eliminating waste and curbing extravagance has been such as to command the respect and confidence of the American people.

The first year under President Wilson there was a saving of $17,258,000 as compared with the last year under President Taft. The next year there was a saving of over $10,000,000, and this year, if the extraordinary appropriations for preparedness were excluded, there would be a substantial saving.

During all of this time the unusual world conditions have called for unaccustomed appropriations. Also, the steady growth of the country and the many new duties undertaken by the Federal Government have tended to increase the cost of running the Government. The marvelous showing for economy by the present administration can only be accounted for by its resolution to eliminate all waste and useless expenditures and to curb the pork-barrel appropriations that disgraced previous administrations.

Some Republican newspapers delight to publish articles that are calculated to carry the impression that the present Congress devotes most of its time to the passing of public-building bills. Even the Republican candidate for President was misled by these articles and made the charge against Congress in one of his political addresses. It will doubtless be a surprise to many people to learn that there has been no public-building bill passed during the present administration.

One of the first acts of the Democratic Party when it obtained control of Congress was to prohibit the erection of a post-office building in any city where the postal receipts are less than $10,000 per annum. This law will prevent the repetition of such extravagant acts as the erection of costly buildings in villages of only a few hundred inhabitants, which were of frequent occurrence under Republican rule. All the articles in the press nowadays to the effect that small villages have been given post-office buildings are not founded upon fact. The most that they can mean is that individual Congressmen have introduced such bills, but not that they have been given favorable consideration by Congress.

Furthermore, there has been an enormous curtailment of the appropriations for rivers and harbors. The three appropriations of the past three years for this purpose make a total of $67,000,000, or an average of $22,000,000 a year. The significance of these figures will be easily discerned when it is known that the Republican rivers and harbors law for 1902 carried $65,357,602 and the one for 1907 carried $87,062,432.

All appropriations for rivers and harbors improvements during this administration have been based on reports of a board of expert engineers of the War Department.

EFFICIENCY AND CIVIL SERVICE.

The splendid record for economy that the present administration has achieved is simply an instance of the efficiency that has been shown in all the work that has been undertaken. Business and scientific principles have always dominated. Every appointee to office has had to satisfy very exacting requirements and pledge to devote at least eight hours a day in attention to the duties of the position. Any neglect of duty or wrongful conduct or inaptitude for the particular work undertaken has resulted in a separation of the appointee from his job.

The civil-service laws have been rigidly enforced. A recent statement of Acting Chairman of the Civil Service Commission Charles M. Galloway contains the positive assertion that "the number of positions subject to competitive examination has increased greatly during the period." He mentions among the employees of the Government that have been put under civil service during the past three years and who have been required to take a competitive examination the following: "Clerks in fourth-class post offices, 62,000; mail messengers, 7,725; star route contractors, 12,432; total, 82,157." He explains that aside from the transfers from the list of political appointments to the civil-service register, which do not mean the creation of new positions, "there has been no increase in the number of employees in the executive civil service." Furthermore, he says that "the number of exemptions from examination of newly created positions has been small."

In the closing months of President Taft's administration, President Taft attempted by Executive order to give a civil-service status to about 30,000 fourth-class postmasters who had never taken a civil-service examination, but whose appointments were entirely political. President Wilson very early in his administration revoked this order and required that all of these places should be filed as the result of competitive examinations given by the Civil Service Commission. It took the Civil Service Commission about 18 months to complete its task, but now every fourth-class postmaster has evidenced by successfully passing a civil-service examination his ability to perform the duties of his office. President Wilson should be commended for substituting a genuine civil service for a fake civil service. However, the Republican platform, with no explanation of this situation, condemns the act as a "gross abuse and misuse of the law," and the Republican candidate for President, in one of his campaign speeches, refers to it as if it were one of the important issues for the people to determine on November 7.

It has been my experience, and I am sure that mine has not been an uncommon experience, that the administration has been too tolerant with the overzealous partisanship and pernicious political activity of hold-over appointees whose original appointments were due to political influence, but who retained their positions under this administration owing to the fact that the President who appointed them very kindly undertook to give them a life tenure by issuing an Executive order placing them under civil service without an examination.

Civil service is intended to be synonymous with merit rule. It is supposed to promote efficiency in the public service. In so far as it achieves its purpose it should be jealously safeguarded. However, some of the bitterly partisan ward bosses that were given political appointments under previous administrations and who were then covered into the civil service were not born again by the process of being placed under civil service without an examination. They still possess their strong partisanship, and in order to benefit the party which they favor they have attempted to confuse and disrupt the very service which it was their duty to advance. By discourteous treatment of citizens with whom they come officially in contact and by criticisms of the laws that they were engaged in administering they have deliberately undertaken to arouse opposition to the party in power. They knew that the offended persons would not visit resentment upon them but upon their innocent chief. Such insubordination and disloyalty to duty are even less desirable than incompetency and would be endured for a shorter period by a private employer, and yet the present administration has tolerated such conduct that it might keep stainless its record for strict adherence to civil-service principles.

It has been an unfortunate circumstance that the present administration has been compelled to rely upon such disloyal and partisan hold-over subordinates to carry out its policies.

PROSPERITY.

The United States is now blessed with a prosperity that is greater and more general than ever before. Every industry is flourishing; manufacturers generally are from one to two years behind with orders despite large extensions of their plants; there was never more building being done; the railroads were never so overwhelmed with traffic; every kind of labor is fully employed and at increased wages, the total increase for the past three years amounting to over $3,000,000,000; the aggregate resources of the national banks of the United States at this time exceed by approximately $3,000,000,000 the aggregate resources of the Bank of England, the Bank of France, the Bank of Russia, the Reichsbank of Germany, the Bank of the Netherlands, the Swiss National Bank, and the Bank of Japan all combined; the increase in the resources of national banks of this country in the past 12 months exceeds in amount the entire resources of the Reichsbank of Germany; there were never more automobiles nor were they ever going faster than at the present time.

Only recently the Committee on Statistics and Standards of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States, after a thorough investigation of conditions, has made a report which shows that this prosperity is permanent; that it is upon a substantial foundation, and that the coming of peace in Europe will produce no lull in commerce or industry.

The safest criterion of prosperity is recognized to be the status of building operations. This line of activity responds last to any wave of prosperity. There is considerable conservatism about erecting great structures such as hotels, apartments, stores, and so forth. There has been in recent months a huge expansion in building operations. It indicates the confidence of owners and investors in continuing good times. It insures increased business activity, because it means not only huge demands for all classes of materials which enter into construction, but it furnishes tonnages to the transportation lines and gives steady employment at high wages to skilled workers. Permits issued from January 1, 1916, to August 1, 1916, in some of the principal cities of the United States show amounts monthly, as follows: January, 81 cities, $46,378,478; February, 82 cities, $47,580,578; March, 85 cities, $72,933,633; April, 83 cities, $76,927,860; May, 84 cities, $100,149,728; June, 86 cities, $72,408,488; July, 87 cities, $103,016,666. The total valuation for the seven months is $519,395,431.

When the farm-loan banks get into practical operation huge additions to the values will be added monthly to new construction work in the United States, and material men and members of the various building trades will enjoy unparalleled prosperity.

The farmers have been told for years by Republican prophets of evil that a Democratic administration would so reduce the price of their products that they would be driven into bankruptcy. No blockade has served to shut off competition with other agricultural countries, and yet prices have been uniformly better during the past three years than during previous administrations. The average price of wheat under Roosevelt was 78 cents a bushel; under Taft, 87½ cents a bushel; and the present price is $1.51 a bushel. The average price of corn under Roosevelt was 45 cents a bushel; under Taft, 54 cents a bushel; and the present price is 87 cents a bushel. The average price of oats under Roosevelt was 35 cents a bushel; under Taft, 37 cents a bushel; and the present price is 45 cents a bushel. The average price of cattle under Roosevelt was $8.22; under Taft, $9.73; and the present price is $9.90 to $11.10. The average price of horses under Roosevelt was $184; under Taft, $202; and the present price is $205. The price of hogs under Roosevelt was $7.23; under Taft, $9.38; and the present price is $11.30.

In 1912 the total wealth of the United States was $187,000,000,000; the total wealth of the United States in 1916 is $228,000,000,000. The total of manufactured products in 1912 was $20,672,000,000; the total of manufactured products in 1916 is $30,900,000,000.

The effort is being made by partisan opponents of the present administration to mislead the people into believing that this marvelous prosperity is due to traffic in war munitions. A study of the facts is all that is necessary to refute such a charge. The total of all exportations to the allies during the past year amounts to only 3 per cent of the total manufactures of the United States. Of course, only a fraction of these exports, estimated at 5 per cent, consisted of arms and ammunition, showing that only one-sixth of 1 per cent of our total manufactures was war products. Of course, our manufactures are only a part of our total trade. Such a comparison of the war munitions business with our total business shows that only an infinitesimal portion of our prosperity has any connection whatever with that traffic. As the report of the Committee on Statistics and Standards of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States shows, it can stop without any perceptible effect upon our commerce and industry. It is an insult to the intelligence of the American people to charge that our present stupendous and universal prosperity is due to a traffic that comprises only a very small fraction of 1 per cent of our total business. There are many strong reasons for believing that the cessation of the traffic in arms and ammunition will really improve the business of the United States, making it possible for us to care for trade now neglected that will tend to promote good will rather than hatreds.

Not only have we been able to finance this gigantic business, both domestic and foreign, but we have been able to make large loans to a number of countries. The allies have obtained practically $1,000,000,000 in loans besides large credits for considerable periods of time. Germany has secured almost an equal amount through the private sale of war bonds. Also we have made large loans to South American and other neutral countries. Nearly every neutral country except the United States has been rendered practically bankrupt by reason of the war. We have been able to help all, those at peace and those at war, and still have a greater prosperity at home than this country has ever experienced before. Up to the beginning of this administration we were dependent upon England for funds to finance all of our big projects and even to move our crops. We had to compete with the world and at the same time pay interest to our chief competitor upon the money with which we did business. The situation has now changed. Hereafter we can finance ourselves abundantly, and our competitors will have to pay us interest for money to carry on their trade. If we have the wisdom to keep out of war, our children and our children's children need not know a stringency of money or credit in the United States.

NATIONALISM V. SECTIONALISM.

Another accomplishment of the present administration has been to establish the Democratic Party as a national party and to effectually disprove the insinuation so often made that it is dominated by sectional interests.

A review of the legislation enacted clearly shows that the good of the whole people must have actuated Congress in passing it.

The Democratic Party has Representatives in Congress from 38 States, and the Republican Party has Representatives in Congress from 38 States. The Democratic Party has Senators from 34 States, while the Republican Party has Senators from only 26 States.

A vast majority of the important positions in the Government service has been filled by persons from Northern and Western States, and they have almost invariably performed their duties with conspicuous ability. It might be interesting and instructive to examine and analyze the important appointments from a sectional viewpoint.

On the Federal Reserve Board there were named Charles S. Hamlin, of Massachusetts, Frederic A. Delano, of Illinois, Paul M. Warburg, of New York, and Adolph C. Miller, of California, as northern and western members, while W. P. G. Harding, of Alabama, was named as the southern member.

On the Federal Trade Commission there were named Joseph E. Davies, of Wisconsin, Edward N. Hurley, of Illinois, Will H. Parry, of Washington, and George Rublee, of New Hampshire, as northern and western members, while W. J Harris, of Georgia, was named as the southern member.

On the Federal Farm Loan Board there were named Herbert Quick, of West Virginia, Charles E. Lobdell, of Kansas, George W. Norris, of Pennsylvania, and W. S. A. Smith, of Iowa. W. G. McAdoo, Secretary of the Treasury, a New York man, is ex officio chairman of this board, thus making the membership of the board consist entirely of northern and western men.

On the Interstate Commerce Commission there were named Balthasar H. Meyer, of Wisconsin, Edgar E. Clark, of Iowa, James S. Harlan, of Illinois, Henry C. Hall, of Colorado, and Winthrop M. Daniels, of New Jersey, as the northern and western members, while Judson C. Clements, of Georgia, and Charles C. McChord, of Kentucky, were named as the southern members.

On the Board of Mediation and Conciliation there were named Martin A. Knapp, of New York, and W. L. Chambers, G. W. W. Hanger, and W. H. Smith, of the District of Columbia.

On the Board of Indian Commissioners there were named George Vaux, of Pennsylvania, William D. Walker and Daniel Smiley, of New York, Warren K. Morehead and Samuel A. Elliott, of Massachusetts, Frank Knox, of New Hampshire, Edward E. Ayer, of Illinois, Isadore B. Dockweiler, of California, and Merrill E. Gates, William H. Ketcham, and Malcolm McDowell, of the District of Columbia, thus making a board of 11 members without a single southern member.

On the Supreme Court there have been three members named during this administration, and they have all been from Northern States. They were James C. McReynolds, of New York; Louis Brandeis, of Massachusetts; and J. H. Clark, of Ohio.

On the Cabinet there were named seven northern and western members and three southern members. The Cabinet officers and the States from whence they come are as follows: Secretary of State, Robert Lansing, of New York; Secretary of the Treasury, William G. McAdoo, of New York; Secretary of War, Newton D. Baker, of Ohio; Attorney General, Thomas W. Gregory, of Texas; Postmaster General, A. S. Burleson, of Texas; Secretary of the Navy, Josephus Daniels, of North Carolina; Secretary of the Interior, Franklin K. Lane, of California; Secretary of Agriculture, David F. Houston, of Missouri; Secretary of Commerce, William C. Redfield, of New York; and Secretary of Labor, William W. Wilson, of Pennsylvania.

Among the assistant Cabinet officers and commissioners of bureaus we find the following: Assistant Secretary of State, John E. Osborne, of Wyoming; Assistant Secretaries of the Treasury, Byron R. Newton, of New York; William P. Malburn, of Colorado, and Andrew J. Peters, of Massachusetts; Treasurer, John Burke, of North Dakota; Counselor State Department, Frank L. Polk, of New York; Assistant Secretary of the Navy, Franklin D. Roosevelt, of New York; Commissioner of the General Land Office, Clay Tallman, of Nevada; Commissioner of the Patent Office, Thomas Ewing, of New York; Commissioner of Pensions, G. M. Saltzgaber, of Ohio; Assistant Secretary of Agriculture, Carl Vrooman, of Illinois; Assistant Secretary of Commerce, Edwin F. Sweet, of Michigan; Assistant Secretary of Labor, Louis F. Post, of Illinois; Commissioner of Immigration, Anthony Caminetti, of California; Government Printer, Cornelius Ford, of New Jersey; Assistant Postmasters General, A. M. Dockery, of Missouri, and James I. Blakslee, of Pennsylvania. All of these are northern and western men of most distinguished ability and experience and peculiarly fitted for the particular positions to which they have been assigned.

The most striking list of northern and western men is disclosed in an examination of the appointments to diplomatic positions. Never has that service been handled more smoothly nor with greater distinction, although during the past two years these representatives of the United States have acted for practically all of the warring countries as well as for this country. The list is as follows: Argentina, Frederic J. Stimson, of Massachusetts; Austria-Hungary, F. C. Penfield, of Pennsylvania; Belgium, Brand Whitlock, of Ohio; Bolivia, John D. O'Rear, of Missouri; Brazil, Edwin V. Morgan, of New York; Chile, Joseph Shea, of Indiana; China, Paul S. Reinsch, of Wisconsin; Denmark, Maurice Francis Egan, of the District of Columbia; Dominican Republic, William W. Russell, of the District of Columbia; Ecuador, Charles S. Hartman, of Montana; France, William G. Sharp, of Ohio; German Empire, James W. Gerard, of New York; Great Britain, Walter H. Page, of New York; Greece, Garrett Droppers, of Massachusetts; Japan, George W. Guthrie, of Pennsylvania; Liberia, James L. Curtis, of New York; Mexico, Henry P. Fletcher, of Pennsylvania; Netherlands, Henry Van Dyke, of New Jersey; Nicaragua, B. L. Jefferson, of Colorado; Norway, Albert G. Schmedeman, of Wisconsin; Paraguay, David F. Mooney, of Ohio; Persia, John L. Caldwell, of Kansas; Portugal, Thomas H. Birch, of New Jersey; Roumania, Servia, and Bulgaria, Charles P. Vopicka, of Illinois; Russia, David R. Francis, of Missouri; Salvador, Boaz W. Long, of New Mexico; Siam, William H. Hornibrook, of Oregon; Sweden, Ira Nelson Morris, of Illinois; Turkey, Abram I. Elkus, of New York.

Does this read like a list of "incompetent southerners," as Candidate Hughes charges? Does it indicate that "the South is in the saddle"? Does it not look more like the South had been trampled beneath the feet of the Democratic mule?

All appropriations have been distributed fairly according to the population and needs of the different parts of the country. The good-roads law is an example of this spirit of fairness. The Southern States get a total of $19,377,500, while the Northern and Western States get a total of $55,622,500.

Despite this pronounced fairness in a geographical sense, partisan opponents skilled in the arts of political warfare have been untiring in their efforts to convince the public that the President and the present Congress are dominated by southern interests as against northern interests. This appeal to sectional prejudice has been as unwarranted as it has been persistent. As an example of their mendacious efforts to mislead patriotic citizens, especially those who have served under the colors, I might mention how the rumor was started and given wide publicity that Congress planned to change the Stars and Stripes by entwining a representation of the stars and bars within the blue field. A few gave credence to this report and wrote to me concerning it. I found upon investigation that but one resolution had been introduced suggesting a change in the national flag, and that resolution was introduced by EVERIS A. HAYES, a Republican Congressman from California, and did not propose the change that was mentioned as objectionable. Shortly afterwards Representative GEORGE S. GRAHAM, a Penrose Republican, of Pennsylvania, proposed that the heirs of certain graduates of West Point and Annapolis who had resigned from the Union Army to join the Confederate Army should be allowed the longevity pay to which they would have been entitled had they remained loyal. This proposition was voted down overwhelmingly, but its defeat did not prevent the publication in many northern papers, including a number in my own district, of the statement that it had been passed, and the articles were headed "Another Confederate victory."

I shall not undertake to enumerate all of the baseless charges that have been circulated in an attempt to mislead patriotic sentiment, but they have been numerous. The charge that southerners do or can dominate Congress is untrue. The fact that they have many of the important chairmanships is due to length of service, but no increased power goes with a chairmanship. A chairman presides over the deliberations of a committee, does the bidding of the committee, and votes only in case of a tie. Also, Congressmen under the present organization are not so servile as to accept the report of a committee without scrutiny. The same spirit of independent voting that pervades the country controls the actions of Congress.

The accusation that northern Democrats have been disloyal to the section which they represent, that they have been untrue to the Union which their kindred fought to preserve, is as absurd as it is dastardly. It is equally unjust to insinuate that southern Members of Congress feel no national responsibility, that they are actuated solely by a desire to gain something for themselves by depriving other sections of that to which they are entitled. It is a peculiar circumstance that they have claimed less and received less under the present administration than they got under recent Republican administrations. Under the CANNON régime especially there was a studied effort to develop a reserve corps of southern Members that could be relied upon in emergencies to put down revolts in the Republican ranks over the rules or over tariff schedules or over other matters vital to stand-pat policies. They did not gain much by the attempt, because progressive southern sentiment is quick to rebuke reactionary officials the same as northern constituencies, but in the attempt to thus gain allies millions of gold were dumped into southern creeks and bayous and Federal buildings were generously distributed among southern cities. One has only to refer to an old rivers and harbors act or an old public buildings bill for verification of this statement. Of course no publicity has been given to that circumstance, but the slightest consideration now given to the South is heralded to northern districts as something unprecedented and as something that should not have been thought of. Both the North and the South are entitled to equal and exact justice. It has been the purpose of the present administration to give that sort of treatment.

MEXICO.

Those who have no care for the present or future of Mexico, who wish to see the United States involved in complications, who sympathize with the element in and out of Mexico that would have the old order restored which kept the Mexican people in ignorance while their inheritance was being bartered away, who hold Mexican concessions which they are eager to exploit, together with those who like to print and read sensational news, are all united in a cry for war with our neighboring Republic. A desperate political exigency has caused the Republican Party and its standard bearer to join in this demand for intervention in order to gain the support of the war promoters. They call this patriotism, but patriotism is not a selfish love—my land against all others, but my land for all others.

All these demands for intervention are reprinted in the papers of Mexico; all of the criticisms of the President's policy of forbearance and conciliation and helpfulness and peace find wide publicity there; mischief-makers have worked unceasingly upon the ignorance of the Mexicans in an effort to convince them that Americans are responsible for all the trouble that has come upon that unhappy country in recent years. With all these elements that make for irritation, resentment, and misunderstanding, and with the hopeless poverty and despairing misery of the Mexicans, and the war-torn condition of the country, it is little wonder that a considerable portion of the Mexican people has become reckless and even criminal and has made the possibility of a clash between the United States and Mexico imminent, perhaps unavoidable. In the circumstances, it is the province as well as the bounden duty of the dominant factor in the case to heal rather than to aggravate the rupture, to resist to the last degree of tolerance the impulse to use force.

There could be no credit to this Nation to whip Mexico. It would require a great stretch of the imagination to find anything in the accomplishment that could be made to reflect glory upon the greatest of modern democracies. Picture in your mind the sight of a giant Republic of 100,000,000 people, with resources equal to the resources of all Europe, springing at the throat of a weakling Republic of 15,000,000 half-starved, half-naked people, whose homes have been destroyed, whose cities have been wrecked, whose treasury is bare, from having been engaged for five years and longer in a war, perhaps a blind struggle, to free themselves from the tyranny that has kept them in darkness and ignorance and poverty. There is no honor to be attained in such an unequal contest. No one applauds a man who strikes a child. No one admires a giant who whips a cripple. No nation on earth would credit us with either courage, nobility, or good sense if we engaged in a war of subjugation and conquest with Mexico. It is to be hoped that calmer councils will prevail, that our peace-loving President will be able to overcome the conditions created by the scrdid war promoters and, taking Mexico by the hand, lead her to light, peace, liberty, health, wealth, and prosperity.

There should be no discordant voice in the United States as he counsels amnesty and a restoration of stable government and warns against a reign of revenge and terror. Mexico should understand that his voice is not the voice of a party, but the voice of the entire Nation. His power will be tremendously increased, the prestige of this Nation greatly enhanced, if Mexico understands, once for all, that the whole force of the American people is behind him.

We have heard much of the connection between preparedness and diplomatic achievement, of the need of a giant Army and a colossal Navy to give meaning and force to our words in negotiating with foreign countries; but, after all, the worst element of weakness in a nation, the element that will influence other nations more than military or naval weakness, is to have the people divided against themselves, torn by conflicting opinions, their voice that of Babel rather than one voice that rings clear and strong. Partisanship should stop at the Nation's boundaries. The President's failure in Mexico would be the Nation's failure. His triumph, by whatever means achieved, will be the Nation's triumph. It will be a tribute to the inspiration, vision, and high purpose of all America to have peaceful methods succeed and to avoid the slaughter and hatreds that would be engendered by resort to arms. The President has tried steadfastly, despite calumny, misinterpretation, and discouragement, to help Mexico; and, although the road has been rocky, he has driven far toward the ultimate goal of adjustment of all difficulties without intervention, which would engender an undying hatred in the proud and sensitive Latin spirit of Mexico, and, because of sympathy and race kinship, would forfeit the good will and intimate trade relations established during the past three years with South America.

In order to safeguard our border until the Mexican Government can gain full control over lawless elements, the United States has stationed an Army along the border. Inasmuch as the border between the United States and Mexico is about 2,000 miles in length, it requires a considerable Army to patrol it. The policy of having a military patrol of the border between two countries is not new nor peculiar. All of the neutral nations of Europe that touch the warring countries have such a border patrol, and usually for a border one-tenth to one-twentieth the length of the Mexican border they have three or four times as many soldiers as are now stationed by the United States along the Mexican border.

If peaceful means should fail and intervention should become necessary as a last resort, then the policy of having had the Army stationed for several months on the border will be shown to have been a very wise one. The soldiers are now being acclimated, hardened, and thoroughly trained. After several months on the border they will be able to enter Mexico without the frightful loss of life from sickness that would have otherwise attended such an expedition. By fall they will be seasoned soldiers, able to resist the climate and the elements, and to fight with multiplied skill and endurance. If we must enter Mexico to purge and to pacify it, there is no reason why we should not choose the season for the task and take time to acclimate, harden, and train the soldiers who are to be charged with that service. The complaint is made that it is expensive, but it is no more expensive to maintain an army there than to quarter it elsewhere in the country, and Congress, by only 25 opposing votes, voted to maintain a larger permanent regular army than this emergency has called out. If it is all right to pay for a much larger permanent army, even if it is to do nothing, why complain about the expense of this army that is performing a real service?

The charge of vacillation in dealing with Mexico is shown to be inapplicable when all the facts are considered. However, it is not a crime to change one's position, provided the change makes one nearer right. No doubt the constant prayer of Woodrow Wilson has been that of Socrates, who, when he feared that he had unintentionally taken a false position, would say, "I pray that He will impose on me the just punishment of him who errs; and the just punishment is that he should be set right." The person who is such a slave to consistency that he will not change his mind to conform to changed conditions is too small to be President of the United States. It will be remembered that Lincoln was charged with vacillation, and he replied: "Events are controlling me, I am not controlling events." Wilson can utter these words as truthfully in 1916 as Lincoln did in 1864.

AMERICANISM AND PEACE.

The most worthy accomplishment of the present administration—the one that the people will longest remember with pride and gratitude—is that the President has kept us at peace with the world. While Europe has been engaged in a wild orgy of slaughter, making its soil sodden with the blood of fathers, husbands, and sons, and inflicting untold hardships and sufferings upon women and children, the United States has passed safely through every crisis and its people have been free to enjoy the delights of peace and prosperity. This consummation so devoutly to be wished has been achieved without loss of essential honor or sacrifice of American ideals. It has been insisted with equal emphasis to all offenders, English as well as German, German as well as English, that our rights shall not be invaded and our demands for strict observance of our rights under international law have been respected. The Government was bound not by opinions but by precedent and international law. To depart from precedent in the midst of a war would be not a neutral but a distinctly unneutral act. Doubtless the strict adherence to international law has resulted in instances in unfair advantage to one or the other of the belligerents, but we could not make that our concern if we desired to maintain our neutrality.

Out of the turmoils and strife and bitterness this Nation has emerged unified, with a higher and truer Americanism and stronger nationally and internationally, ready to continue its course toward a high destiny. If in the excitement and stress of the times that tried men's souls there were criminations and recriminations between those entertaining different views as to the method to pursue to attain the end for which all prayed—that of peace with honor—a calmer state of mind has returned now that the storm has passed and the American spirit of fair play is again triumphant.

Thoughtful and fair people of all political parties can not fail to credit President Wilson with this great achievement—the preservation of the peace of the Nation and the consequent conservation of the lives of its young men and the resources of its people. However, the Republican candidate for the Presidency seeks to discredit his sincere endeavors and to repudiate the Congress which with unfailing and unfaltering loyalty has sustained him in his foreign policy.

For an answer to all such criticism we shall go to another eminent Republican Samuel W. McCall, now governor of Massachusetts, who in a lecture at Yale last year on "The Liberty of Citizenship" said:

To rebuild history in imagination and to avoid in our minds the errors that have been made is not at all a difficult art. It is no more difficult than to get rich out of yesterday's stock market. But the statesman who stands in the front of the advancing line and faces the future has no control over the past. His domain is the present, and he strives to influence what is to come. He must act before he knows how things are going to turn out.

Gov. McCall has admirably described the difference between President Wilson and Candidate Hughes in this campaign. The President is the man who has been "in the front of the advancing line" and who had to act before he knew how things were going to turn out. Candidate Hughes has been sheltered in the cool and quiet cloisters of the United States Supreme Court and now rushes out to censure the man who has borne the heat and brunt of the battle.

Surely there can be no question as to Woodrow Wilson's patriotism, no question as to his solicitude for the dignity and welfare of the Nation. He has always kept a clear eye, a firm hand, and a level head at the helm of the ship of state and has steered it steadily to a true course when a single mistake at the rudder might have proved disastrous. There are very few indeed who would deliberately attempt to thwart him in his efforts to maintain the honor of the flag while keeping the country at peace, and yet, unfortunately, the attitude and criticisms of many overzealous partisan opponents, such as Candidate Hughes, have made the way harder than if he had been confronted with declared and open enemies of the Republic and its institutions. At no time in the history of the Republic has there been less room for politics in the discussion of questions touching the honor and safety of America. These continued criticisms and aspersions have served to create the impression in the countries with which he has had to untangle international problems that his voice is not the true voice of this Nation and that his demands might be denied with impunity, because a strong adverse sentiment here would tie his hands and render him helpless to insist upon his demands. The fact that he has been able to overcome these almost insuperable partisan obstacles and to achieve a victory in every essential contention demonstrates not only the justice of his position but the tremendous power and almost superhuman patience and self-restraint of the man.

CONCLUSION.

The record of the present administration is truly remarkable whether we consider its legislative and administrative achievements or its successes in diplomacy. At no time since Lincoln have conditions of equal delicacy and difficulty confronted this Republic, conditions upon which have hinged the influence and prestige of the United States in world affairs for many years to come. Never has America raised her head more majestically above the storm. Never have high principles and robust ideals been contended for in language more calculated to carry conviction. Never have public questions been regarded more in the light of patriotic duty and less in the light of partisan expediency. The result has been to bring a brighter justice and a broader liberty to the people of this country and to furnish to the world an example which all nations should hope to emulate.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to state that the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB], as the Chair understands, has only three minutes remaining.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I forgot to state to the Chair that the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] has been good enough to yield me 30 minutes of his time.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL].

Mr. SMALL. Within the few minutes that I have I can deal only in a general way with the principles affecting this bill. It is one of the most important pieces of legislation that has been brought before the Congress for consideration. It might well be entitled a bill to promote our foreign trade, because that is the sole purpose of the bill. The bill in its form simply exempts from the operation of the antitrust laws the selling associations or combinations which may be formed for the purpose of engaging in our export trade, in that way removing prohibitions contained in the original antitrust law as amended and the Clayton Act. The bill further provides that the act creating the Federal Trade Commission and prohibiting unfair methods in competition, shall have application as between associations in the export trade. So that every safeguard is thrown around this piece of legislation, that no injury shall ensue to those who are engaged in selling or producing in our home markets.

The increase of our foreign trade is a matter of great importance. Gentlemen oppose this bill who are recognized as distinguished leaders of labor organizations. I say, with the greatest respect to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BUCHANAN] and the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING], that they are not representing the best interests of labor in opposition to this bill. Whatever extends our foreign trade increases production in the United States. Increased production means greater demand for labor, and it necessarily follows that with that we shall have larger wages and better conditions. Our prosperity is involved more directly in the increase of our foreign trade perhaps than in any other one factor. For many years, practically during the last century, our exports consisted of products of the field, the forest, and the mine. Only at the beginning of this century did we begin to export a fair proportion of manufactured products. In 1900 they constituted about one-third of our total exports, and at the beginning of this war, in 1914, nearly one-half. The export trade of the other great exporting countries of the world, notably the countries of continental Europe, have specialized to a very high degree. They have advantages over us in that most of them who do large foreign trade own their own ships, as we do not. If we compete with them, we must compete on equal terms. It is a truism in trade and in business that competition must be upon an equality with your competitors, and the purpose of this bill is simply to unshackle the selling associations engaged in the export trade from the provisions of our antitrust laws, so that they may engage upon a parity with the manufacturers or producers in other countries who are our competitors in the markets of the world.

We can not secure this foreign trade, we can not perform this act, which is so essential to our continued prosperity, unless we put our exporters upon this plane of equality. The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING] said that powerful interests are in favor of this bill. I have no knowledge of the truth of his statement, but, if there are powerful interests, I wish to remind the House that we had an instance yesterday of powerful interests coercing the Congress of the United States to establish an eight-hour day to railroad employees, and that of those powerful interests the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BUCHANAN] are distinguished exponents. It does not lie in their mouths to talk about powerful interests being behind any legislation before this Congress. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SMALL. I suppose I can not have any more time?

Mr. WEBB. I am very sorry. I wish I could give the gentleman more time.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET].

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I intend to vote for this bill, but it does seem to me the facts in relation to it should be candidly stated to the House. The report states, and states correctly, that the necessity for this legislation rests largely upon the doubt that exists in the minds of our exporters as to the correct construction that should be placed upon existing antitrust laws as applied to organizations engaged in export trade. And I am interested in one statement in the report. Speaking of shipping, it says frankly and correctly:

> Some of these countries grant additional advantages in the way of preferential freight rates for export shipment.

I have heard Democrats for many years deny that there was any of that kind of subsidy given foreign steamship lines, and I am glad to have this express statement to the contrary in the report from the able and well-equipped Democratic Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WEBB. I will say to my friend from New York that I got that information from the report of the Federal Trade Commission.

Mr. BENNET. And it is true.

Mr. HARDY. If the gentleman will permit me to state, that same fact has been stated by the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries. Every Democratic Member knows that fact to be true.

Mr. BENNET. I am glad that in a Democratic Congress that has had facilities for getting information, they have at last gotten the truth, which was known——

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman permit me further?

Mr. BENNET. I am sorry I can not; I have only 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. BENNET. Now, the fact about this bill is this: I have not any doubt that at some time in the future it is going to help the small manufacturers. And the situation is very simple. So long as foreign competitors have huge combinations or large combinations with which they control trade in countries where we must compete, if we are to have an export trade we must either have large combinations or keep out of the export trade. Now, I will admit, people can take their choice. So far as I am concerned, I want to get into the export trade, but I am not willing to let this House vote on the bill with the idea that it is simply to help out combinations of small exporters. It is not. The bill will immediately be largely utilized to help out the allied industries of the National City Bank of New York. Why not tell the truth about it? In November, 1915, they organized the American International Corporation. I do not assume that. You can find out the facts in their circular of August, 1916. They have formed a combination, and in connection with the combination exhibit what I will call for lack of a better term "the new honesty." They believe in doing things and telling the public about it. They organized the American International Corporation under the laws of the State of New York for the express purpose of going into the foreign trade business, and they bought a large interest in W. R. Grace & Co., doing an extensive shipping business. They bought a large interest in the United Fruit Co., owning extensive plantations and other interests around the Caribbean, and operating steamers in that trade. They bought a large interest in the International Mercantile Marine Co., the largest owner of shipping anywhere. With their selling agencies you do not have use for the organization of more selling agents. They tell very frankly of the organization of one of them, the Allied Machinery Co. This company was previously organized to act as foreign sales agent for certain American manufacturers of machine tools.

In addition to that they have organized the Latin-American corporation under the laws of Maine, and that corporation will make its headquarters in Buenos Aires. They have also organized the American International Terminals Co., and through another subsidiary now control the Bank of Haiti. So that the situation is this, that the stockholders of the National City Bank already own or control selling agencies in South America and the only two large shipping lines between North and South America, W. R. Grace & Co. and the United Fruit Co. Then in connection with the European trade they have a substantial interest in the largest ship-owning corporation in the world, and in addition to that they have a contracting concern, and the first accepted contract was with the engineering firm of Ulen & Co., of Chicago, a $5,000,000 proposition, to build water works and sanitary works in three cities of Uruguay. They are going to be paid in government bonds of Uruguay and they are going to market those bonds as the debentures of the American International Corporation. In addition to this the same interests have now purchased the well-known, old-established bond house of N. W. Halsey & Co., control the Bank of Haiti, and have branch banks all through South America. We are on the era of a great experiment and a great problem. I am for this bill because I believe in this foreign trade——

Mr. HULBERT. At that point will my colleague yield for a question?

Mr. BENNET. Yes.

Mr. HULBERT. Has my colleague heard it suggested by firms engaged in export trade that the establishment of free ports in this country would be of considerable aid to the extension of export trade to South American countries?

Mr. BENNET. I have not heard it stated by any firms, but I believe it to be a fact.

Mr. HULBERT. Does not my colleague believe it would be advantageous to the extension of our export trade to provide in this bill for a study and report of the feasibility of establishing free ports in this country as an aid to building up our export trade?

Mr. BENNET. I would vote for it myself.

Mr. Chairman, how much time have I?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has three minutes remaining.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, in conclusion I want to read in connection with this bill from the Report on the Committee on Cooperation in Foreign Trades of the National Foreign Trade Council, which submitted a pamphlet, I think, to all the Members of the House, advocating this bill. I will read a part of it. They said, first, or they made a declaration, in favor of this principle in connection with the Webb bill, H. R. 16707, on May 27, 1914. And then they say, this nonpartisan body:

> The declaration came at a time when industry languished, labor was idle, and machinery stood still. A steady increase of foreign trade, beginning in 1908, had been arrested. Exports in 1914 had fallen below 1913, but imports had increased. Natural commodities predominated in the exports and finished manufactures represented the enterprise of a comparatively small number of industries. The recent enactment of a competitive tariff—> had turned the eyes of many producers to foreign markets. Slack demand at home prompted investigation of opportunities abroad, for both those already embarked in export trade and those desirous of beginning found across their path the obstacle of European government-encouraged export combinations, enabled by cooperation to eliminate destructive competition, reduce the cost, and increase the efficiency of foreign selling.

They also said:

> Manufactures, devised by American inventive skill and fabricated by American labor, well adapted to foreign needs, remained unexported because the cost of introduction to the over-sea consumer was too great for the individual company and cooperative effort on the European plan legally too hazardous. Meanwhile leagues of foreign buyers, skillfully playing one group of American producers against another, were obtaining the products of American fields, forests, and mines at less than domestic prices.
> EUROPE'S ADVANTAGE.
> Foreign manufacturers thus obtained American raw materials more cheaply than American manufacturers, a telling advantage in the ultimate contest to market the finished merchandise. The American producers thus exploited dared not cooperate. An incalculable advantage rested with Europe.
> WAR-TRADE PROSPERITY.
> The European war restored prosperity to the United States. Abnormal demand and prices for munitions, foodstuffs, and raw materials accelerated industry and recalled idle hands to the forge. During the fiscal year ended June 30, 1916, exports exceeded imports by more than $2,000,000,000. Trade with neutral markets, as well as Europe, has grown. Export commerce is more diversified, a greater number of manufactured articles being sold where natural products formerly predominated. The full-time and overtime operation of many mills and factories is due to foreign demand.
> The principle that foreign trade is a vital element in domestic prosperity is daily demonstrated. An unprecedented proportion of American labor and invested capital is now dependent upon foreign markets.

I want to call the attention of the House to the fact that while we are voting for this bill, and while it is a good bill, that if we had maintained the rates under the Payne bill and maintained the home market against the assault of the foreign manufacturer, we would have had so much to do at home, not only in spots and in connection with the trade in munitions, but in connection with general manufacturing industries of the country, that we would not have been confronted with the pressing necessity which now exists for this bill.

Under the Payne law exports increased in four years $720,000,000, or a yearly average of $180,000,000. Under the Underwood bill they show in the 10 months between October 1, 1913, and August 1, 1914, $180,000,000. Therefore we now have to pass bills to encourage exports other than those consisting of munitions or caused by the war abroad. What we need most in the way of legislation is a tariff which, after the war, will protect our home market, which consumes 93 per cent of our manufactures. It is right and proper to look after the 7 per cent, as this bill does, but when the Republican Party returns to power March 4, 1917, it will look after the 93 per cent as well.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer a few remarks in reference to this bill. I realize that it is going to pass and know that I can not convince this House that it ought not to do so. The public press is in favor of it, and there seems to be a growing conviction that the Sherman antitrust law has about outlived its usefulness.

My attention has been called to an article in the Washington Post of the 30th of last month by "Holland," calling attention to the general drift away from the Sherman antitrust law. It seems to me he is justified in saying we are drifting away from it. We passed the Clayton Antitrust Act, so called, but anybody that has given it any consideration, anybody that has consulted with lawyers who have had to apply it, agree, I believe, that it is a long step toward reducing the rigors of the Sherman Antitrust Act. We have just passed a shipping bill. That contains another provision that wipes out a portion of the Sherman Act.

Now, we are asked to change that law by still further reducing its force and its scope. I do not believe that this law ought to be passed at this time, in the closing hours of this session. It is too important. It may seem strange that so few have protested against its passage. Still I am not surprised, knowing the interests that are behind it. These interests are apparent from the hearings, the newspapers, and from the letters that have reached Members. I want, however, to call your attention to this bill and what it really means. I believe this House ought not pass it blindly. I do not believe there are a dozen men on this floor that have the least realization of what it does in fact mean. We are providing that the Sherman antitrust law shall not apply to export trade; but we are doing much more than that.

How are you going to separate the export trade from the domestic trade? Anything that materially affects the foreign trade will of necessity affect the domestic. You authorize the creation of corporations that will have the right to restrain trade. That means that they may do anything to prevent others from competing with them. They may make contracts with foreign corporations that will give them exclusive control of all the trade in any line in any country; they may divide their earnings with such foreign corporation to effect their purpose, or engage in any or all of the methods condemned by our courts as illegal under the Sherman law. At home these methods have ruined competitors. In trying to have this bill passed you leave the impression that these methods may only be used against the foreigner, but that is not true. There is no attempt in this bill to distinguish between the domestic and the foreign exporter. Under this bill the corporations to be created may use against his American competitor the same lawless means that you permit against the foreigner. He may use the means that has been successfully employed to bankrupt rivals at home, and you say by this bill that such methods shall henceforth be legal. You plead for the small manufacturer. It is the old story. When you try to punish a corporation you are reminded of the widows that own the stock. It is only the strong that can stand such competition. The little fellow never asked for lawless competition. The large corporations do not need this law; to them it is only of service to exclude the small competitor. This bill is misnamed. It should have a different title from that which has been given to it.

Instead of being called a bill to aid export trade, it should be called a bill to suppress competition in the export trade. Who will be the ones against whom the corporations you create will direct their lawless methods? Why, it will be chiefly against the people at home. It will be against their competitors here, because those are the ones with whom they will mostly come in contact.

Mr. BORLAND. Does the gentleman care to yield there?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I have not much time, and I would rather not.

Mr. BORLAND. I just wanted to ask the gentleman whether his hearings did not disclose that the small manufacturer in this country had very small opportunity at present in export trade?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I will come to that in a minute if you will permit me. You will remember that a few years ago the manufacturers of steel rails arranged with European combinations to parcel out the world's market in steel rails. Nobody could enter the steel-rail business while that pool was in force. Such a combination will be absolutely legal under this bill. Are you going to vote for that sort of a proposition? That is the kind of a proposition that is put up to us here to-day. I do not believe I will unless the bill is materially amended. I believe it can be amended to make a good bill. I could give you any number of illustrations of cases where this bill will not help but will give a license to rob the man at home as well as the man abroad.

But I want to call your attention to another feature of this bill—its effect on home industry. Just as soon as this bill becomes a law it will become legal for the various corporations that may be engaged to some extent in the foreign export trade to organize foreign selling companies. They may sell only a few goods across the border in Canada after they have organized such company. They may hold their annual meetings or their monthly or weekly meetings at which they can fix the export prices of their goods from which their prices at home may be fixed without any difficulty and without any agreement.

We all remember the Gary dinners. The Gary dinners did not undertake to fix prices, but still the Gary dinners were declared illegal as the consultations had at these dinners were sufficient to fix prices without any agreement. These meetings will be legal and there will be no necessity of any formal agreement as to domestic prices, and agreement as to foreign prices will be enough. What will become of competition after these organizations have become general?

I understand we have to-day in this country arrangements between coal operators that are effective in maintaining uniform prices. They have a secretary to inform each member of the combination at what price each is selling his coal, and that notice alone is sufficient to maintain uniformity of prices. I understand they have another arrangement on the Pacific coast in reference to lumber—I mean shingles—that operates on the same principle and with the same effect.

A number of other instances can be cited where that plan works to the utter destruction of competition and in disregard of the Sherman antitrust law. You are legalizing this method of evading the Sherman law under this bill. Do you think you ought to pass a law open to all those objections? It is urged that we ought to because in foreign countries there are large combinations, and that the only way we can protect ourselves is to have large combinations in turn. That argument does not appeal to me. I want to tell you that there is no country under the sun that has as large combinations as the United States. There is no combination in any other country of the world that can match the United States Steel Corporation. It is in a class by itself, but there are others—the American Tobacco Co., the Standard Oil Co., the International Harvester Co., and scores of others challenge comparison. I could read you a list of concerns that outmatch anything there is in any foreign country. Let me give you a few of them: The General Electric Co., with $179,000,000 of assets; the Swift Co., with $206,000,000; the Armour Co., with $209,000,000; the American Can Co., with $106,000,000; the American Tobacco Co., with $176,000,000; the American Sugar Refining Co., with $122,000,000; the American Smelting & Refining Co., with $200,000,000; the American Locomotive Co., with $124,000,000.

I could go on and enumerate dozens and dozens of those large corporations. The fact of the matter is that nearly every American industry in this country capable of combination is combined more effectively than if a part of a cartel, which, I understand, rests upon agreements as between the parties.

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Yes.

Mr. FIELDS. Does the gentleman realize that these corporations referred to are already in the market in every country in the world?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Yes; these corporations are in the market, and I have not been able to find any little corporation that wanted to get into the market. The scheme is being pushed by the large concerns. They no doubt want this sort of an organization, so that they can go out and exclude the small competitor. And you will find, if this bill passes—and I have no doubt it will—that that is the effect it will have. It will exclude the small fellows and give greater monopoly to the large corporations.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Yes.

Mr. FORDNEY. What "large concerns" does the gentleman mean? Did they appear before the committee—these people?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. They did not all appear.

Mr. FORDNEY. If they did not all appear, how does the gentleman know they are engaged in attempting to get this law enacted? How does the gentleman know they are scheming to get this law?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I know that every large newspaper in the country is in favor of it. That sort of a propaganda does not spring up without somebody pushing it. I know, from the letters that have been sent out in favor of it, and the character of support it has had generally.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Yes.

Mr. WEBB. Is the Springfield (Mass.) Republican a corporation-owned paper?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Well, I am not here to be cross-examined as to who owns all these newspapers.

Mr. WEBB. You said "all the press."

Mr. SLOAN. The gentleman said "the metropolitan press." Springfield is not a metropolis.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I want you to point out in this bill any protection against the dangers to which I have called attention. This bill is carefully drawn for the very purpose of giving the power to which I have called attention. The very object of this bill is to give a license not only to exploit foreign corporations and buyers but to exploit our own people in the foreign trade. [Applause.]

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TAVENNER].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TAVENNER] is recognized.

Mr. TAVENNER. Mr. Chairman, I wish to ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TAVENNER] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WEBB. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. FIELDS].

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that a good many of the gentlemen who have spoken on this bill fail to distinguish between selling agencies, as provided for in this bill, and purchasing agencies. Many of them fear that it will result in a trust that will monopolize the purchasing of the grain, cotton, and manufactured products of this country. That is not the purpose of the bill. The purpose of the bill is to create selling agencies in the markets across the sea. The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING] seems to oppose the bill because he believes the great and powerful interests of the country are behind it. Does not the gentleman know that every great corporation in this country is now represented in the markets of every country in the world, and does he believe for a moment that these great companies will unite with their smaller competitors in the markets of the world when this bill becomes a law? Every man who has had any experience in selling goods knows the contrary is true. While I have not been an exporter or connected with the export business, I have had some experience in selling goods. In fact, my business life before I came to Congress was confined to that line of business. Every man who knows anything about selling goods and wares knows that the greatest element of cost in business is the selling cost. Now, there are many manufacturers in this country who can not go into the foreign market because the selling cost that they would have to incur would be so great that it would absorb, or more than absorb, their profits.

Mr. DILLON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FIELDS. I can not yield in the five minutes that I have. We will take, for instance, the International Harvester Trust. That trust is in all the markets of the world; yet there are small manufacturers. Perhaps one is manufacturing a drill; another manufactures a rake; another manufactures hoes; another manufactures plows; and under the provisions of this bill these different firms can organize and form a selling agency with each firm represented in the foreign market, whereas neither one would be able to go into the market single handed and alone, because, as I have said, the expense of putting a representative into that market would be greater than would be justified by the amount of business that he could possibly secure.

They talk about the monopoly that would be formed under this law. Does not every man know, who knows anything about the selling of goods, that the profits of every firm depend upon the amount of goods that it sells? Therefore, would they organize a selling agency under this law for the purpose of suppressing business? It will be the aim of that association to get every dollar's worth of business that it can get; and while I do not know how these agencies will be organized, I suppose that each member of the association will be taxed according to the amount of business that the association gets for him. That, in my opinion, would be the part of good business judgment. Therefore the agency, in order to exist, must get business in the foreign market. No man can believe for a moment that the United States Steel Corporation would go into this agency or would form an association with other manufacturers of steel products, because the United States Steel Corporation is already in the market, and it will not be worth anything to that corporation to form these agencies. But it will be worth something to the small manufacturers, who are not able to go alone into foreign markets, but who by this association can lessen the expenses so that they may go in.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WEBB. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CLINE].

Mr. CLINE. Mr. Chairman, I believe this measure, whose object is to "aid and encourage our manufacturers and producers to extend our foreign trade," ought to receive the united support of the membership of the House. The bill seeks definitely to exclude the operations of the Sherman Antitrust Act of 1890, and acts amendatory thereof, from operating against combinations engaged exclusively in the foreign trade. The Federal Trade Commission and the Secretary of Commerce do not now believe that such combinations for foreign trade exclusively constitute a violation of the Sherman Antitrust Act, but favor this measure solely to make certain that of which many good lawyers are in doubt. We are confronted with this situation: We are the greatest export Nation in the world. The immense volume of our foreign trade has aroused the jealousies of our competitors and driven them to measures to secure a part of our business. For more than 20 years England, Germany, France, and recently Japan, have been strengthening their commercial relations in the world foreign markets. Manufacturers and exporters of these countries have established selling and purchasing agencies in all the principal markets of the world.

The respective countries have authorized their great financial centers to establish branch banking institutions to handle the credit of their several agencies. The German people, quick to conceive the possibilities of combinations in both buying and selling the German products, have encouraged their several great industries to act as a unit in their respective fields in both selling their productions abroad and in purchasing their raw material for importation. The exporters of coal, glass, dyestuffs, pottery, and many other articles are a unit in their respective fields. When they buy lumber, coal, copper, cotton, and electrical equipment of us their system is so complete, so perfect that they play one American seller against another, hammer down the market, and buy for less than any foreign people, and buy for less than the manufacturer sells to the domestic consumer at their very doors. That is the condition we are face to face with. But what makes it more perplexing than before is that these combinations are more extensive. Not only the manufacturer and producer of one country are combining, but the manufacturer and producer of frindly countries are uniting. The countries aligned in the present great war are associated together for aggressive action. Nothing appears to me more imperative than some action of the Congress to meet the situation. The great manufacturing nations of Europe are staggering under many thousands of millions of indebtedness. There is no way to meet this immense debt except from profits on foreign business. They have vast volumes of inflated currency and securities without sufficient gold reserve. Every effort will be resorted to to capture our markets and fortify their credit with the gold now in American vaults. Not one of the countries of Europe with a foreign commerce worthy of the name but what has back of all its enterprise and every undertaking for the benefit of its trade the Government in which it is situated. Germany and England before the war had more than 500 selling and purchasing agencies scattered through the world.

I am in favor of putting the American exporter in the same relation with his business that the foreign exporter is. I deprecate very much the fact that the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING] and the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] have thrown into the discussion of this proposition an assumption that an invisible force had acted upon the committee, or brought its influence to bear in shaping this legislation. That is very cheap talk. When a man desires to make that kind of a statement the principal thing to do is to state specific facts and not cast over the subject the shadow of some hazy doubt reflecting upon the committee.

In what situation is the American exporter placed with reference to his business? In the first place, his competitor abroad has all the carrying power to get the goods to the foreign markets. In other words, the American exporter must rely upon his competitor for the means of getting his goods into the same market that he is contesting for. In the third place, he has to face the differential freight rate offered by the Government that stands back of the foreign exporter to the same market. In the next place, he had to face a combination of all these forces that act as one man in the sale of their respective products.

There can be no question but what, after this war is over, there will be the greatest competition in the foreign trade that the world has ever seen.

Another fact that we have come to know is that no nation was ever great and prosperous that did not have a great foreign trade. We manufacture 30 per cent more goods than we consume. If we were unable to dispose of this surplus, of course calamity would follow. It is the business of this country to see that the markets of the world get the advantage of our manufactured products.

Not only that, Mr. Chairman, but in the great conflict now going on abroad the allied nations have entered into combinations to assist and maintain one another in their export business. This bill does not provide for a purchasing agency; it provides for a selling agency. For instance, the only help that we now have in disposing of our goods abroad——

Mr. DILLON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CLINE. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. DILLON. Would not the exporting business include the right to purchase in order to export?

Mr. CLINE. Not in a foreign market.

Mr. DILLON. No; in our local markets.

Mr. CLINE. Of course it includes the right to purchase, but not in a foreign market.

Mr. DILLON. To purchase in a local market and sell in a foreign market.

Mr. CLINE. Yes; but the gentleman forgets one proposition, and that is that there is always competition in this country in the export trade, and gentlemen forget one other proposition, and that is that we do not supply the market regardless of others. In every market which we enter we find competition from every quarter. Consequently that is a check upon any price monopoly that we might seek to maintain.

The American business man, single handed and alone, is compelled to spend many thousands of dollars to establish one agency, and find after it is established his associate manufacturer in the same line of business underselling him to the united purchaser. It is well stated in the report, "Why not give our producers and manufacturers the same advantages as their competitors have?" Of course I would not be in favor of the bill if in any way it was to be made applicable to our domestic trade. I would go further, if possible and give the exporter a preferential freight rate to meet these powerful international organizations who associate themselves together against American business.

But, Mr. Speaker, let us resort to more direct evidence of the purposes of foreign Governments as exhibited in the foreign press. The London Times of one week ago took the American Republic to task for its neutrality in the present great European war. It speaks vindictively and with bitterness. I quote as follows:

There was a moment at the beginning of the war when the whole duty of the American Government palpably and surely was before it. For good or ill, that moment was allowed to pass. America did not intervene, did not move. If by this failure she lost nothing of material importance, and may, for that matter, rather have gained in so far as her own immediate advantage is concerned, she certainly forfeited post bellum rights which would have been hers if she had taken upon herself the burdens and responsibilities of interference. This view of her position is fully appreciated in those quarters where American neutrality is upheld in the face of all criticism, and, obviously, is the correct view.

Undoubtedly the Times speaks with some authority; at least it voices the opinion of England's administrative officers. It is difficult to understand clearly what is meant by "intervene" unless it is understood that we should have intervened to redress the invasion of Belgium. We were under no legal duty to intervene in Belgium, and consequently violated no international law or principle when we refused to intervene. The Times, if it speaks authoritatively, is assuming a large rôle when it attempts to censor the conduct of a neutral nation because in the observance of well-recognized international law we did not seek to waive it for England's benefit and advantage in a foreign war. No nation can erect a code of morals that shall violate well-settled principles of international law and compel neutral nations to observe it simply because it is to its advantage to do so. The text says, because we did not intervene we "forfeited post bellum rights which would have been hers if she had taken upon herself the burdens and responsibilities of interference." We are to understand by that expression that post bellum rights are matters of contract to be bought or lost according to our conduct. We enjoy no rights dependent upon the favor or bounty of any individual power, and no such power has a right to dispossess this Nation in its sovereign rights of the exercise of those fundamental principles that lie at the very base of international obligations. We shall continue to assert our rights that are not dependent upon the caprice of any other power. Our trade opportunities must be increased and a wider field for our export business, to be permanently held, must enlist the earnest support of Congress. I hope the bill will pass.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND].

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, this bill is designed to promote the export trade of the United States. It is an attempt to harmonize the law and regulations of this country with the actual conditions of competition in the foreign market. For some time I have been studying this situation, because I have the honor to represent one of the great commercial centers of the United States—one of the great primary markets of the rich Mississippi Valley, and one which will inevitably be a leader in the export trade of this country in the near future. Kansas City is the farthest point inland which has water connection with the seaboard, and is the center of an immense agricultural producing area.

I am one of those who believe that this country has finally passed the crest of the wave. From its foundation down to within the last decade it has been an exporting country of raw material. In other words, it has been stripping itself of its natural resources and selling them in the free-trade markets of the world under the strongest form of competition. Within the last decade, however, the tide has turned, and now we are exporting more manufactured goods than we are raw material. This will be our commercial destiny for the future. If it were not for the war in Europe causing such an extraordinary demand for wheat, cotton, and beef our exports of raw material would be very much smaller in comparison to our exports of manufactured goods.

It is to the advantage of our country and all classes of our population that we build up a foreign trade in manufactured articles rather than depend upon the export of raw material. When we send abroad raw material such as wheat or cotton, it follows inevitably that the capital and labor of other countries will be expended on that material to bring it to condition for consumption. We should be prepared now to expend our own capital and labor upon our own material and ship it abroad ready for use. The nearer an article can be brought to a condition for actual consumption the better its economic value is to the country which produces it. The wilderness country, with a large amount of undeveloped resources, with scant population and with little local capital, must depend upon the shipment of raw material in order to enter into the commerce of the world, but a highly civilized and developed country must inevitably pass beyond the wilderness stage and must find sooner or later that it is doing itself an economic injury in not expending all the capital and labor necessary to get its own products on the market ready for consumption. In other words, I believe that it is an economic crime for a nation to continue to export raw material when it could export manufactured goods. This is neither Democracy nor Republicanism, but plain business sense.

Take the subject of breadstuffs, with which I am principally familiar, and which constitutes the great source of wealth of the Mississippi Valley. It is manifest that if we send abroad wheat, as we have been doing for the last hundred years, it will be ground into flour by foreign mills, to the advantage of foreign capital and with the employment of foreign labor. The by-products, such as the bran and shorts, will feed the dairy herds, and develop the milk, butter, and cheese industry of the countries where the mills are located. And the flour, if not consumed in the country where manufactured, will be sold in the neutral markets of the world under a foreign trade-mark by foreign selling agencies, to the profit of foreign concerns. All of this is done with our wheat, and has been done for nearly a hundred years. How much better it would be for us to send abroad the flour, after having expended upon the wheat our own capital and our own labor, and reserved to ourselves the advantage of the by-products in our own country.

How much better it would be for us to build up a trade on American flour, manufactured in the Mississippi Valley, under our own trade-marks and brands, so that the excellence of our products and the prices they were able to command in the market would be to the advantage of our own people.

We all know that to the south of us, from the Rio Grande to Uruguay, is a group of nations who are almost without an adequate local supply of wheat flour. This group of South American countries buys a large quantity of its flour from the port mills of England, and from Hamburg and Bremen. In many cases it is made out of American wheat. This trade should all be ours, but we have not been able to command the trade because we have not furnished the proper instrumentality to reach it. We have not had shipping facilities under our own flag. We have not had American banks and financial institutions in foreign countries; we have kept up a tariff system which drove the trade of those countries to Europe and excluded it from our own ports; and we have had no method of supplying the customers promptly, regularly, and with a due consideration to their local demand. We have had no method of extending the credit to carry on transactions over a long period of time and throughout an extensive trade territory.

The great cities of the Mississippi Valley are filled with splendid modern flouring mills, and a few of them have been able to enter the foreign trade, but in a rather unsatisfactory and sporadic manner. Even the larger mills of ample capital find a difficulty in establishing selling agencies of their own and meeting the enormous expense necessary to place their goods directly on the market. Most of our American flour, therefore, has gone unbranded in bulk to foreign selling agencies who were able to meet a draft drawn against a bill of lading. These foreign selling agencies in turn brand the flour with their own mark and make the profit on its sale. The smaller mills located in the small towns all through the Mississippi Valley have had no method of reaching the foreign trade at all.

I have instanced flour, but I might go further and say that we could manufacture crackers, biscuit, and breadstuffs, packed and prepared to meet the local demand of other countries.

The purpose of this bill is to permit a number of business men to unite in establishing selling agencies in foreign countries through which to market their goods. The contracts or agreements under which these selling agencies are established are subject to the supervision of the Federal Trade Commission so that they may not result in a monopoly or tend toward the restraint of trade in our country. It seems that all classes of business men who have studied this subject are in favor of this legislation, but some fear that it is an abandonment of our policy as expressed in the Sherman antitrust law and other acts for the suppression of monopolies. It does not seem to me that this is the case.

In the first place, I do not think this law is needed for the encouragement of the great industrial combinations of our own country. The Steel Trust is amply able to enter the foreign market through its own agencies. The Standard Oil Co. has been in the foreign trade for years. The American Tobacco Co. and the Beef Trust have never found any difficulty in seeking a foreign market. This law is not needed for the great combinations of capital which we now have, but it is needed, as it seems to me, for the countless small manufacturers and many business men whose capital is comparatively large, but not large enough to handle the trade in their line of even a single foreign country. We must not forget that when our business men go abroad to seek trade they must be in a position to go after the business and get it, and thereafter to hold it on terms at least as favorable as the competitors whom they find in the field. All of the great commercial nations of the world who seek the markets of neutral countries have adopted this principle of selling agencies through which a number of business men can unite in marketing their own product. This is true of Germany, France, and England.

Those who fear that we will aid in some way American trusts by this law must direct their attention to the fact that we are to-day feeding the foreign trusts with our raw material or our partly manufactured goods, and they are skimming the cream off of our industry in the foreign field. We must continue to help these foreign trusts, or we must have some form of lawfully meeting their competition, for this country is getting too big to confine its business within its own borders.

I am extremely anxious to see this important step taken, especially at this time, when the field of foreign commerce is so inviting to us. Now that the great commercial nations of the world are finding their resources taxed to the uttermost to maintain a struggle for national existence, they are not in a position to throttle, as they certainly would throttle, an attempt on our part to gain a foreign trade. On the contrary, the countries which have formerly been supplied with goods by our commercial competitors are now anxious and eager to welcome our efforts to open communication with them. We must take this step now before the war in Europe ends, for, after peace is declared, a great economic struggle will begin. Such a struggle is inevitable, for the countries which have been impoverished by war have always maintained a high degree of industrial skill, and they must bend every energy toward restoring the losses and ravages of the present conflict. The time is peculiarly favorable for this attempt, and I hope that among the other triumphs of this administration for the good of our Nation may be the definite entry of America and all of its producers and business men into the great foreign markets of the world on a basis of strong and active competition which will bring the tide of wealth continually into the ports of this country.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee determined to rise; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. RUBEY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 17350 and had come to no resolution thereon.

UNITED STATES EMPLOYEES' COMPENSATION.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 15316, an act to provide compensation for employees of the United States suffering injury while in the performance of their duty, and for other purposes, and that the House insist on its amendment and agree to a conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 15316, and that the House insist on its amendment and agree to the conference asked for. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER appointed as conferees on the part of the House Mr. WEBB, Mr. GARD, and Mr. VOLSTEAD.

PROMOTION OF EXPORT TRADE.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 17350.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 17350, with Mr. RUBEY in the chair.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN].

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, of course it is not possible for a man to state his reasons for supporting this bill in three minutes, nor to make an argument to show the reasonableness or propriety of it, which I believe, feeble as my faculties are, I could do if I had the time. I favor the bill because I think it removes a few of the barriers between our producers and the ultimate consumers in other parts of the world. I particularly, as a partisan, favor this bill because, I regret to say, a great many people have, erroneously I hope, an idea that the party of which I am an humble member is hostile to business as business. That is not true. I spent all of my life before I came to Congress in commercial pursuits. I was engaged in the export trade in a large way. I did not have the assistance of any such association as is contemplated in this bill.

Fortunately, I did not need it, but I traveled throughout the world to a large extent in the prosecution of my business, and I saw then and realized the handicap of the small producer and manufacturer in this country. I then said that if ever an opportunity came to me to relieve them of that handicap I should gladly embrace the opportunity.

It seems to me that this bill is carefully drawn. It defines, in language as plain as it can be written, what shall be the privileges and what the exemptions of these associations authorized to be created under the law. There is no danger of monopoly growing out of it. We have monopolies at home, properly so in some instances. I have always believed that such monopolies as the telephone and the street railway and things of that kind were good for the people. We control them and regulate the price that they shall charge for the services they render. We are going to control this association or the corporations or partnerships authorized under the act, and under the language of this bill we do it absolutely.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I regret that the charge has been made that "powerful interests" are backing this bill. So far as the chairman of the Judiciary Committee is concerned, and the members of that committee, we know no interest that is backing this bill except the compelling interest in the nature of a very powerful report presented to the Congress away back in May, from a body whose business it is to guard the American public and at the same time promote American manufactures, the Federal Trade Commission.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. ANDERSON. I want to ask if the Federal Trade Commission did not at the time it made its recommendation also insist that there should be some provisions in the law which would insure to the exporters of the United States equal treatment as between each other?

Mr. WEBB. Yes; and that is in the bill distinctly, if the gentleman will take the time to read it. If any American exporter deals unfairly with another, the one that does the unfair dealing may be haled before the Federal Trade Commission and punished, even if his unfair conduct is in Shanghai or Rio de Janeiro. That is clearly provided for in express terms.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. The only punishment that could be meted out to the offender would be an injunction.

Mr. WEBB. And that is the only punishment that you can mete out to them to-day, when their conduct is in the United States. We mete out to them the same punishment as you would if they were guilty of unfair competition in the United States. Would you have any different standard?

I have received, and the committee has received, hundreds of letters and telegrams from all over this broad land, and I never heard of the Steel Trust or the Coal Trust or the oil people or the harvester people ever even asking that such a bill should be passed. They have their agencies scattered over the world to-day, which is the very thing we want to enable the little fellows to do, in order to compete with the big fellow. This bill is essentially a bill for little manufacturers in the United States, to enable them to get a foothold in foreign markets.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. BENNET. Had the gentleman heard prior to this afternoon of the activities of the National City Bank and its allies?

Mr. WEBB. I had not, and never heard of it before, but because they want a good bill does not induce me to oppose it. Here is the concluding statement sent by these five gentlemen who compose the Federal Trade Commission:

> If American business men are to make the most of the great opportunities now before them, are to build securely in foreign trade, and are to avoid disaster in the shock of the stern and determined competition that will doubtless follow the war, they must at once perfect the organization demanded by the conditions of international trade.

If there has been any seeming desire to push this measure through Congress, no private interest has been behind it, but the public interest has backed it up for the purpose of giving American manufacturers an opportunity to establish themselves in foreign countries, and thereby keep their factories running within the United States and continue to employ labor here. The bill really, as many newspapers have said, is a bill in behalf of the laboring people of the country. The bill is safeguarded as nearly as human ingenuity can safeguard it with reference to the American public, and I do not say that because I am the author of the bill, but the bill is indorsed heart and soul by the Commerce Department, which has charge of foreign and domestic trade relations. It is indorsed by the Federal Trade Commission honestly and heartily, and it is indorsed by the newspapers of the country who want to see the manufacturers of this country prosper.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. The gentleman says that this bill is indorsed by the Department of Commerce. I know that the Secretary of Commerce in a general way recommended a bill along this line.

Mr. WEBB. I tell you, my friends, I went and talked with him. I had this bill in my hands and I read it, and he said to me he was heartily in favor of it.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. He has not written any letter.

Mr. WEBB. Because he said his recommendation covered it. I know the gentleman will take my statement, because I was very anxious to find out how the men we put in charge of the trade of this country felt about it.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Of course, I do not call in question the statement of the gentleman.

Mr. WEBB. Talk about big interests back it! It is all bosh. The big interests are not backing it. It is the little fellows who are cramped to death by the big fellows, because they have no way open in order to meet the big men on foreign soil on anything like even terms. They can not meet the combinations they run up against in foreign trade, and if we expect them to continue this competition in the foreign trade they must have a selling organization to enable them to do it. As it is, you are sending out an army of men armed with cornstalks, with no general, with no captain, with no lieutenant to meet an army of men armed with rifles, organized by generals, down to the lowest lieutenant. You might as well expect them to compete on equal terms, as to expect the American business man, American exporters, with no organization, simply individuals, to meet with success the competition of the world where the foreign manufacturer is combined into cartel, organizations, and even trusts and monopolies.

I for one am in favor of giving the American manufacturer an equal chance with the foreign manufacturer. I would not deprive him of any legitimate advantage in the world's race for trade. I would keep him within the provisions of the Sherman antitrust law wherever the American flag flies, but outside of that I would turn him loose and tell him, we permit you to do in foreign countries just what those foreign countries permit your competitors to do. You are free in that territory. As I said on yesterday, if we are running a horse in this country where we put 100 pounds on him and every other horse in that race has a hundred pounds on him, that is a free and fair race, but if you take an American horse and put him in an international race and place a hundred-pound weight on him and his competitors have no weight at all, then you seriously handicap the American horse. That is the situation we are in to-day and for one I am in favor of an equal competitive basis in foreign countries so far as those foreign countries will permit them. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I ask that the bill now be read under the five-minute rule, but before doing that I will yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CROSSER].

Mr. CROSSER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BENNET. I notice this bill has numbered sections divided into paragraphs. I ask if we are considering it according to the numbered sections?

The CHAIRMAN. The bill is being read by sections.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the words "export trade" wherever used in this act mean solely trade or commerce in goods, wares, or merchandise exported, or in the course of being exported from the United States or any Territory thereof to any foreign nations; but the words "export trade" shall not be deemed to include the production or manufacture within the United States or any Territory thereof of such goods, wares, or merchandise, or any act in the course of such production or manufacture.

That the words "trade within the United States" wherever used in this act mean trade or commerce among the several States or in any Territory of the United States, or of the District of Columbia, or between any such Territory and another, or between any such Territory or Territories and any State or States or the District of Columbia, or between the District of Columbia and any State or States.

That the word "association" wherever used in this act means any corporation or combination by contract or otherwise, of two or more persons, partnerships, or corporations.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I regret exceedingly that some gentlemen in the House feel that this bill is in the interest of monopoly and that men who vote for it are monopolists. My good friend from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] a few minutes ago made a statement, which he afterwards stated he intended to modify, when he referred to a lumber combination on the Pacific coast. He did not intend to say that. He meant to say he had understood men engaged in the manufacture of shingles had some understanding. I want to say to the committee that the Government, through investigation, after the expenditure of large sums of money to determine whether or not there is a Lumber Trust in this country, report that there was not, giving the lumbermen an absolutely clean bill of health in reference to combinations. This bill, as I understand it, is for the sole purpose of permitting men engaged in the production of some product in this country to establish selling agencies to sell their products abroad and obtain the best possible price for them.

I am not in the lumber business on the Pacific coast; that is to say, I am not a manufacturer there. I do sell logs. I know this, however: That in San Francisco there are established brokers who dispose of almost all the lumber sold foreign. The brokers of San Francisco control, indeed, absolutely foreign sales. The millman must sell through the broker at such price as he can obtain from the broker and not from the foreign purchaser. I know of a cargo of lumber recently sold by a broker in San Francisco where it was discovered shortly after that cargo had been shipped that the broker made $4,000 out of that one cargo in his commission. The broker goes to the millman and offers him an order for export, and when the price is given he—the broker—states that he can go to his neighbor or to some other manufacturer on Puget Sound or the Columbia River and purchase the lumber at a price below his price, and, if the man has financial obligations that he must meet, he will sacrifice in order to get trade, so as to be able to continue his business and convert his raw material into money to meet his business obligations. He will sell at a loss, and the broker makes the profit. This bill is intended to permit small competitors to combine and form an association to establish a selling agency where the small man is not engaged in a business sufficiently large to warrant him in sending abroad his agents to sell his product in the foreign markets. That is the purpose of this bill. It enables the small operator to obtain the highest possible price for his products in the foreign market.

Some reference has been made to the steel companies. Mr. Gary, president of the United States Steel Corporation, appeared before the Ways and Means Committee and testified under oath at the time the Payne tariff law was being framed, and when asked the question, "At those Gary dinners do you arrange the prices?" he replied, "No." "Why is it, Mr. Gary, then, that the great steel company which you represent, which produces 44 per cent of the steel produced in this country, gets the same price for its product that the independent producer or steel manufacturer gets—all alike? Is it not true that all the steel companies of this country get the same price on steel rails?"

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Gary said there was no arrangement of prices and no such thing as discussion of prices. "Then, Mr. Gary, how is it that you all sell at the same price?" He volunteered this information. He said, "I can give you my opinion and you can take it for what it is worth. We are the producers of 44 per cent of all the steel produced in the United States. We send out our circulars monthly"—as I remember it. "Everybody can obtain our circulars, and our competitor, the independent, small producer, can see from our list the prices we ask for our products. He knows he can not go into the markets where we sell and get any more for his goods than the price asked by our company, and he is afraid to undersell us, for fear that we may go into the market and undersell him and put him out of the business. And for that reason the independent manufacturer sells at the same price that we do." This was his opinion, or words to that effect.

That seemed reasonable to me. It was stated yesterday that one selling agency might combine and sell all the products of this country for export. What does the lumberman know about selling cotton? What does he care about cotton? Nothing. The Standard Oil Co. has its agencies in every country of the world. It cares nothing about this bill. The United States Steel Co.

has its agencies in every country in the world where they sell. They care nothing about this bill. But there are 48,000 sawmills in this country, gentlemen, 20,000 of which are small mills that produce less than 20,000 feet of lumber per day. None of those manufacturers can establish a selling agency abroad. Their small business will not permit them to do so. There are brokers in New Orleans and in Mobile, Ala., in the export trade. I am engaged in the manufacture of lumber in the South, and we sell for export. We must sell through those brokers in New Orleans and Mobile. A small portion of our product goes foreign. We can not afford on the small amount of our product that goes abroad to establish a selling agency abroad. It is too expensive.

Mr. CLINE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. CLINE. I would like to say to the gentleman that I know of a corporation in Indiana that spent $60,000 single handed to sell goods in South America.

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes. The small man does not sell enough of his products abroad to establish an agency or warrant him in sending an agent abroad. Under the terms of this bill the small manufacturer of lumber—and I speak of lumber because I am engaged in the business and know something about it—can combine with a large number of his competitors in that business and establish a selling agency through which all the lumber manufactured for export by those small manufacturers, or a certain number of them, can be sold and the highest price obtained in the foreign markets for it.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. I have a telegram here from the lumber people in California, particularly in Humboldt and Trinity Counties, where they are manufacturing redwood lumber. These people say they are much in earnest in having this measure become a law. Now, does not the gentleman believe that this bill will relieve these lumbermen in their export trade?

Mr. FORDNEY. I believe this, my friend, absolutely. Those mills, for instance, on Grays Harbor in the State of Washington manufacture 700,000,000 feet of lumber every year. About 40 per cent of that lumber is sold abroad. On the Columbia River there is some four or five hundred million feet of lumber manufactured yearly. These are two territories which are separated by some 150 miles. Each of those territories can establish an office in San Francisco, where, if export trade comes, they, through their officers, can direct their agencies in foreign countries to sell and get the best prices obtainable and thereby cut out the middle man, who is so much talked of here. He produces nothing. He does not employ labor at all. Those sawmills in this country employ 800,000 men. They pay taxes. They help maintain this country in the payment of taxes. What does the broker do in this respect? Practically nothing. Do you want to convert the profits from the milliman, the real producer, the employer of labor, to the broker? If so, vote this bill down and you will accomplish your object.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. EAGLE. Mr. Chairman, I have had no conversation with or telegram or letter from anybody asking me either to support or to oppose this measure. But with this measure, as with all others that come before this House, I tried to read it and consider it upon its merits, based upon my experience and my judgment of its effect upon the country as a whole. I can not perceive one single reason why it should not pass, but, upon the other hand, there are innumerable reasons why it ought speedily to pass. The time has come in this country, and it has been so for some years past, when it is considered almost not respectable to be a successful business man. That is a shameful condition of affairs. It is popular in this Chamber for any man to utter a tirade against capital, against business men, and in favor of any particular class of people who have a large number of votes. But it is less popular for men to vote and speak for those measures that give a larger breadth of industrial opportunity to the men who risk energy and money in new enterprises which develop the raw resources and employ the labor of this country and thus keep the industrial machinery in operation.

Whether that be an accurate observation or not, I would like to say this thing: That it is as much the duty of every man, irrespective of his politics, in this Chamber to safeguard the legitimate rights of invested capital and not unjustly to punish the managers of capital which is employed in legitimate industry upon a safe, moral, and sane basis as it is to perform any other duty of statesmanship that comes to us for consideration and attention.

The general purpose of the antitrust legislation of Congress has been to say to men, "You may, of course, do business legitimately, but none of you, if you be so inclined, shall oppress those with whom you compete, or so act as to oppress the consumers"; and yet, instead of understanding that to be its purpose, the understanding, unfortunately, seems to be in some quarters that thereby the Congress have accused legitimate business in this country of being an aggregation of cutthroat monopolists, and so the country seems unduly and unjustly arrayed against those who employ capital.

I wonder if a considerable number of the membership of this House have either ever inaugurated a business enterprise and labored for weary years to set it upon its feet, or as counsel or officer or director in large business enterprises ever went through the narrow opening in the mazes of legal restrictions imposed and hedged about it, and thus by experience have come to understand how intricate and difficult is the task to pass through that opening and retain your respectability in the estimation of your neighbors? If you never did, then you are a theorist rather than a person who actually knows that it is almost not respectable in public estimation to have or control successful business.

The fact is that the only basis on which our present national prosperity can possibly be maintained is that the business men, from the small ones to the large ones in this country, be not unduly oppressed, so that they may manage, without going to jail and to the penitentiary, their businesses within reasonable legal limitations, and so make capital reasonably remunerative in order that labor may be constantly employed at a decent and proper wage; and that can be done only if American export trade be maintained. [Applause.]

There is universal misapprehension and universal difference of understanding as to the scope and meaning of either the original Sherman antitrust act or of the limitations imposed upon the free business conduct of men in this country by the recent Clayton amendments. No man wants to be indicted as a common criminal for running his business according to his serious judgment and conscientious understanding, and often under the advice of counsel that he has the right to do a certain thing merely because some public official interprets a statute differently. It ought to be too plain for men to differ about.

No head of a business firm wishes to waste the time, energy, and money of his stockholders and officers and to see his business languish by litigation instituted upon a misunderstanding, irrespective of whether he is right on the ultimate outcome.

Accordingly the fact is that a man in the United States at the head of a business enterprise hardly dare telephone or write or visit or confer with a man in a like enterprise with himself with a view to a common understanding with reference even to the necessary export business, even when his motive is not to try to create a monopoly, and thus not to violate the antitrust law.

Now, then, this measure in no sense undertakes to modify in any degree the existing antitrust laws as they apply to the United States, to domestic business; but does any man present in this Chamber or in this Nation, be he capitalist or laborer, be he in one vocation or in another in life, conceive any reason or justice why 2 or 3 or 10 men engaged in a common enterprise in this country which employs capital and labor, and produces products for export, and thus is a helpful thing for American business, should not be permitted to confer upon those conditions that obtain in a foreign country, why he or they may not have common understandings as to the export of American products and their sale in foreign countries? I am sure not.

Take as an illustration any State and any line of industry. If one manufacturer of some American product and my friend from Indiana [Mr. CLINE] as another, and my friend from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] as another, and each is a small business man, and neither one of the three can furnish an entire cargo of American products to be transported to a foreign market, the result is that they can not individually ship or sell their portion of the American output of their factory into foreign markets; and they dare not make common cause and effort in such worthy enterprise for fear of violating the antitrust laws. They dare not, at present, confer with each other and thus make it possible to act together in such export trade, because of the misunderstanding and the misinterpretation and lack of clarification of the antitrust laws in so far as they might apply to the export trade, although it is to the interest of American producers, employers, employees, and consumers that they do so and thus carry American products for sale throughout the world. This law should pass in order that one may furnish a third of a cargo, another a third of a cargo, and yet another a third of a cargo for export and sale in foreign countries, by the sanction of a law of Congress, and for every other purpose intended to be covered by the bill, which limited time prevents me from discussing at present.

This law will put American business men engaged in the production and export of American products on a level in such foreign markets with their foreign competitors.

There is no danger of monopoly in America growing out of that permission thus granted by that provision. If in the pursuit of that common and worthy enterprise affecting the export trade American manufacturers and exporters do those things that unjustly oppress Americans, and monopolize in such a way as is opposed to the spirit of the antitrust laws of this country, they thereby bring themselves clearly within the prohibitions of the Sherman antitrust law, and hence they will never be likely to do that, because no man relishes a Federal lawsuit, with the pains, criminal and civil, that are imposed for violation of the Sherman antitrust statute. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, a question of order. I do not know whether the gentleman from Wyoming is in favor of this bill or not, but if he is——

Mr. MONDELL. I am against it.

Mr. Chairman, surely the world do move! For twenty years now I have listened to a perfect flood of denunciation, lurid and continuous, from the Democratic side, against about everybody in this country who was either energetic, forceful, successful, or prosperous. Now, we have just listened to a delightful purring, cooing, wooing speech from our friend from Texas [Mr. EAGLE]—Texas, the home of the trust buster; Texas, the home of the professional pursuers of the octopus—to the effect that it is very improper, indeed, to suggest that the corporations of this country generally would do such a wicked thing as combine against the interests of the American people. Perish the thought!

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BUCHANAN] very properly framed an indictment against his party this morning for their remarkable change in attitude relative to great corporations that seek to harm the American people by combinations in restraint of trade. He reminded us how his party that has thundered so against the combinations and the trusts for 20 years and more has grown suddenly quiet since it came into power and has had the opportunity to enforce the laws against these combinations. In the three years that this administration has been in power not a single hand has been lifted, not a solitary effort has been made to enforce the antitrust laws anywhere or against anybody. It is very proper, very logical in this state of affairs that gentlemen on the other side should now apologize for their party for all they have said in the past, and promise better treatment for the trusts in the future from that side. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. Chairman, when I first had my attention called to this bill, when I first read the report, I was inclined to support it. Its title is alluring—a bill to promote foreign trade. We all want to do that, those of us who believe that the home trade is more important than the foreign trade, as well as those who believe that our triumphs in the future should be in foreign trade. And, lured by the title, somewhat convinced by a hurried examination of the report, I concluded that perhaps it might not be a bad thing to amend the Clayton antitrust law and the Federal trade commission law in order to allow more latitude in foreign trade, if it were necessary to amend those statutes in order to give those engaged in foreign trade the right to do legitimately those things necessary to do in the foreign trade. I was perfectly willing, and am perfectly willing now, to have the Clayton antitrust law and the Federal trade commission law amended. I think the best work this Congress will do for years to come will be the work of amending this Democratic legislation. The only better work we will do will be in repealing a considerable portion of it. [Applause on the Republican side.]

But on further consideration I have discovered that not only does this bill amend the Clayton antitrust law and the Federal trade commission law, but it proposes to amend and modify the provisions of the Sherman antitrust law. While I have mighty little confidence in these late amendments and additions to the Sherman antitrust law, I have a great deal of confidence and a great deal of respect for that great statute, and, so far as I am concerned, I shall not vote to modify it or to repeal any of its provisions in behalf of those who claim they desire the privilege of having those provisions modified and repealed in order that we may engage in the foreign trade.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent that his time be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MONDELL. I do not believe it is possible to allow combinations in restraint of foreign trade that will not react upon the local and home trade. I do not believe that it is possible to allow men to make combinations in the foreign trade that would be harmful at home without those combinations reacting on the home situation and being as harmful as those same combinations in the home trade if allowed directly, instead of indirectly, as proposed in this case.

Furthermore, the last Congress prohibited, in the trade of the United States in articles shipped from abroad, the very acts and practices which this bill seeks to legalize. In the act approved February 12, 1913, we made it a felony for the foreigner to do the thing in our market which we now propose to allow the American to do in the foreign market. Where are we to stand before the other nations of the world if, having prohibited certain practices in our market in the sale of foreign goods, we allow our people going into foreign markets to do those things and engage in those practices that we prohibit at home?

Gentlemen have attempted to excuse their defense and their support of this measure on the ground that it is simply intended to authorize the establishment of advertising, selling, and collection agencies. There is nothing in the Sherman antitrust law which prevents the establishment and maintenance of such agencies. Whatever there may be in the Clayton Act, whatever there may be in the trade commission act, certainly there is nothing in the Sherman antitrust law which prohibits or prevents, or ever has prohibited or prevented, manufacturers in the United States making those arrangements necessary to sell their goods jointly in the foreign market. That has been done. It is being done now to a certain extent, and no Attorney General of the United States has ever attempted to bring a case to prohibit or punish that sort of thing. The claim that this is simply legislation to enable men to do those things that are legitimate and necessary in foreign trade is a mere pretense not supported by the legislation itself.

What the legislation would permit would be practices in the foreign trade that are criminal, and properly criminal, under our laws, except for the exemptions of those criminal acts by this statute. In no such way shall the trade of this people ever be largely or permanently increased at home or abroad. When we go to foreign shores carrying goods and merchandise of the American people, let us go with clean hands and bound by the same laws to the same righteous dealings which we insist upon at home. [Applause.]

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 9, at the end of the paragraph, insert the following as a new section——

Mr. BENNET (interrupting). Mr. Chairman, I desire to make an observation upon the section.

Mr. HARDY. I want to do the same thing, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas will be recognized later, and the Chair recognizes the gentleman from New York.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last three words of the section for the purpose of calling the attention of the chairman of the committee to a possible defect in connection with the definition of the word "association" and the language in line 6, page 3. I have read the hearings on this bill and am somewhat familiar with the way the English and the Germans do business in South America, through the German cartels and the English so-called banks.

The purpose of the bill is to permit the formation of associations of a kind similar to those utilized by the Germans and the English. But the language on page 3, line 6, limits the benefits of section 3 to articles of the kind exported by the association. Now, that seems to assume that before the association is allowed the export trade, before it could get the exemption of the act mentioned in the section, it must own the goods in this country and export them from this country. I want to suggest to the gentleman from North Carolina whether there ought not to be inserted, after the word "by," the words "or sold through," or something of that character, so that the line would read "in articles of the kind exported by or sold through the association."

Mr. STAFFORD. Is not the gentleman a little previous in considering a section that has not been read?

Mr. BENNET. I am considering this in connection with the definition of "association."

Mr. STAFFORD. I was going to move to strike out the language after the words "United States."

Mr. BENNET. So that the language would read how?

Mr. STAFFORD. So that it may be restricted to trade competition in the United States, regardless of whether the restriction affects articles of the kind exported or not.

Mr. BENNET. I am frank to say that if that motion is successful it will accomplish what I had in mind. But I want to call the attention of the gentleman from North Carolina to the definition of the word "association," and whether we ought not to insert these words that I have mentioned.

Mr. WEBB. I think this language would include the sale through the association, because it means that all manufacturers may sell through the agency, and it seems to me it would come within the provision.

Mr. BENNET. Let us take a case. As the gentleman knows, the German cartels operate a system something like this: There is a selling agency in South America, we will say, and they want to sell lumber. They put in an order and figures for a large quantity of lumber, more than any one concern can furnish—millions of feet—and they get the contract and they apportion that lumber out among the various firms in Germany that are selling through that cartel. Now, if we have a similar association—and unless we have we can not compete—unless we make the exemption broad enough to cover those who do not own the goods in this country at all, but who are simply selling agents for firms and corporations in this country, we have not accomplished the purpose of the bill as stated by the gentleman from North Carolina and as indicated in the testimony of the Federal Trade Commission before the Committee on the Judiciary. It seems important either that the words be inserted or else the amendment which the gentleman from Wisconsin is going to offer should be agreed to. At this early stage of the bill I mention this because I always find it helpful to have these questions called up early in the bill.

Mr. WEBB. I see the point that the gentleman makes, and undoubtedly one of these export agencies would, by contract or agreement with American manufacturers, have a right to distribute these goods through the sales agents. The gentleman's amendment might clarify it some, but I do not think it would affect the meaning of the bill.

[The time of Mr. BENNET having expired, he was granted, by unanimous consent, three minutes more.]

Mr. BENNET. The gentleman will remember the testimony of Mr. Rublee before the gentleman's committee and his citation of the case of the Banana Co. against the United Fruit Co., and also the illuminating statement of a witness of the method by which these foreign countries sell. They do not own the goods. The selling agencies that we hope for under this bill would not own the goods; they would come under the inhibition of the Sherman antitrust law and other statutes. That is the reason the gentleman gives in his report for the necessity of the bill:

> The necessity for this legislation rests largely upon the doubt that exists in the minds of our exporters as to the correct construction that should be placed upon existing antitrust laws as applied to organizations engaged in export trade.

Unless they sell the goods in the United States to one of these associations, then they do not come under section 3 at all. Or, if you do the other thing, put in the words "sell through," or adopt the suggestion of the gentleman from Wisconsin, strike out everything after the words "United States," you cure the difficulty.

Mr. WEBB. I call attention to the fact that the amendment the gentleman suggests is to that part of the bill where the restriction is on a corporation buying stock in another corporation.

Mr. BENNET. I know what the purpose of the section is.

Mr. WEBB. The gentleman's trouble is as to the restriction with reference to common-stock ownership, and not to the definition of export-trade associations.

Mr. BENNET. Yes; but to my mind, in connection with the definition of the word "association," in lines 6 to 9, if the definition is confined to an association which simply buys goods in the United States, then you have conferred no power anywhere in the bill upon an association which exists simply as a selling agency in a foreign country.

Mr. WEBB. Where does the gentleman find any requirement in the bill that the association shall buy all they sell?

Mr. BENNET. Because it says "any articles of the kind exported by."

Mr. WEBB. Not bought.

Mr. BENNET. Of course, they can receive them as a gift.

Mr. WEBB. Of course, if they are exported, or through their influence they are exported they are still exported by the association.

Mr. BENNET. That is what I want to say—exported by or sold through, so that it would cover both kinds.

Mr. WEBB. I really think the language of the bill covers the point the gentleman makes.

Mr. BENNET. Well, it is the gentleman's bill. My purpose is simply to call his attention to what I think is a defect.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, I approve the purpose of this bill, but I doubt the effect of it. This bill in section 2 authorizes the establishment of an association for export business, or of any number of such associations. It also authorizes the acquisition, without limitation, of the stock of one company by another company or corporation engaged solely in export trade. In the transportation service of the over-seas trade it is well understood that conferences of different ship lines have been permitted, because there is or has been no law to forbid them and no law to authorize them. The result of those conferences was to establish agreed practices and rates, and one of the accompanying results was simply this, that no undesirable competitor of a transportation company or new member was permitted to join in these conferences. These were voluntary associations of transportation lines. This bill authorizes voluntary associations of export trade companies.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARDY. Yes.

Mr. WEBB. The language of the section which he is now discussing is similar to section 7 of the Clayton law, which is extended to these selling agencies. Section 7 of the Clayton law permits corporations to buy stock in other corporations ad libitum, provided such practice does not tend to restrain trade in the United States or tend to create monopoly. We have used the language in restricting these corporations that was used in the Clayton Act, with reference to allowing corporations to buy stock in a common corporation.

Mr. HARDY. I do not know that the gentleman could do better than he has done in framing this bill. The Clayton law may or may not be all right. I am simply discussing this bill as I find it. This bill provides for voluntary organization of export associations.

If the gentleman had a company, and this other gentleman had a company, and I had another company, we may form three voluntary associations, and we may exclude the fourth gentleman who wants to come in to participate in the benefits of our united sales agencies and establishments; and because we exclude him from the privileges of our association he is unable to compete with us or any of us. You would not say that that was pursuing any unfair method, and yet a number of companies voluntarily associating together will acquire by force of their very size a cheapness in handling their products that will be a disadvantage to the man who is on the outside of that association, and then what happens? He finds he can not sell his commodities in competition with this larger aggregation, and then what happens? One of these organizations or corporations embraced in the association is authorized to buy out the little man. What happens in the transportation business? The big shipping lines combine together and form a conference, and that conference can put any independent small competitor out of business by simply refusing to let him join their conference.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARDY. Yes.

Mr. WEBB. This section does not permit the big aggregation the gentleman speaks of to buy out the little fellow unless the little fellow is an association or a selling agency.

Mr. HARDY. No, no; if he is a corporation engaged in that business, this law authorizes any big corporation to acquire or buy his stock or property.

Mr. WEBB. Solely in the export business.

Mr. HARDY. You permit any one of these corporations to buy out any other corporation. You will find that the little corporation will be excluded from the voluntary association by the blackball process. In the shipping business these shipping conferences exclude anyone they do not want in their conference; and when they have excluded a man who owns one or two ships that man is at an immense disadvantage in attempting to compete with them and in reference to all of his general dealings.

Being at that disadvantage one of these little companies can be bought out, be squeezed out, and I submit that that is what will happen under this law. Three or four big companies interested in some commodity or commodities that are being sold in South America form a voluntary association bearing jointly the expense of advertising and establishing the agencies and all the other mediums and means through which they trade. There is another company, not a member of the association, which has a commodity and would like to go into South America into the same territory, that wants to compete. These men already organized for their own interests refuse to accept this company as a member of their association and say to it that if it wants to compete then it must bear all the expenses of employment of agencies and other means of putting its goods on the market separately. What happens? This small company finds that it labors under an immense handicap and is not able to compete with those who are in this voluntary association, and this causes it to go by the board. Some big company of the association then dealing in the same line comes to this small company or man and says, "My friend, you are losing money, and I will buy you out. What will you sell at?" And he squeezes him out at the lowest possible price.

Mr. WEBB. Does not the gentleman think that if he undertook that same process he would not be liable under the Sherman law and the law as set out in this bill?

Mr. HARDY. I can not say.

Mr. WEBB. This section does not allow a selling agency formed for export purposes to buy out the stock of any corporation in the United States unless that corporation is a selling agency, too.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. HARDY. I will ask unanimous consent for five minutes more. I may not use it all.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HARDY. I think the gentleman is mistaken. I am speaking of a corporation endeavoring to sell its goods in competition with goods of this association already organized.

Mr. WEBB. But it is not an association under this bill. It is an American corporation for the purpose of doing business in the United States.

Mr. HARDY. I am talking about an American corporation that wants to organize to do business alone in the export trade.

Mr. WEBB. Then they must organize under this bill.

Mr. HARDY. You must have more than one association.

Mr. WEBB. Indeed you must.

Mr. HARDY. This is what I am speaking of: Here is an association formed of three or four corporations chartered to do business, to sell abroad. Here is another corporation that wants to sell abroad which is not a member of that association and is not allowed to become a member.

Mr. WEBB. The gentleman means a corporation or association under this bill?

Mr. HARDY. I mean a small corporation or a small association. Now you have two associations, one of them powerful, composed of big corporations, big money, big capital. The other is small, feeble, and can not get into the big corporation that is already existing. It is blackballed—is refused admission.

Mr. WEBB. It would not want to get into this association. These individuals form a small association of their own. If individuals want to get into an association they would apply as individuals.

Mr. HARDY. Yes; they would apply and be refused, and then if they were not big enough to buck the combination they would go to the wall.

This law, I think presupposes you will have more than one corporation in an association, and that you will have many such associations. Now you have a strong association, with strong members, and here are some little fellows left out who would like to go into that business. They also form an association. What does the big association do to the little one except to refuse to permit the little association or corporation to come into their combination? The small association is loaded with extra expense. I may not be able to make myself perfectly clear, but if you will take the railroad and ship-line conferences you will see how the big conferences threw out of business every little ship-line company that undertook to compete with them because of the enormous expense to which they were put.

Mr. WEBB. I think I see what the gentleman is driving at. We have provided in this bill, if the gentleman will read section 4, that the pains and penalties prescribed by the Federal Trade Commission act shall apply to that sort of fellow who uses unfair methods of competition and tries to squeeze out his competitor, or anything else that can be regarded as unfair trade methods; and the Sherman law would apply also in such case.

Mr. HARDY. Let me ask the gentleman this question: Would it be deemed unfair to refuse to permit a corporation to join an association?

Mr. WEBB. I do not think so.

Mr. HARDY. Then simply refusing to let this new man or company come in, that could not be charged as being unfair dealing, could it?

Mr. WEBB. There is no way to prevent one fellow being bigger than another.

Mr. HARDY. Then the probability is you permit this organization under circumstances that will result in this condition, that your big associations will ultimately and naturally, by gravitation and without violating this law, absorb the little ones until the result of this legislation will be one stupendous association for export trade.

Mr. WEBB. Well, supposing that happens, and there is no restraint of trade thereby in the United States, the gentleman would not object to it.

Mr. HARDY. Then, to my mind, what the gentleman from Wyoming suggested will take place—that by natural result this vast export association will find itself in a condition to support itself upon the home consumer.

The manufacturer of products in this country will find it to his interest to sell to this vast exporting association the products of his factory here cheaper than he sells them to our own home consumers, and the result will be that we will force into existence a condition which we have always denounced; that is, that our American products will be sold cheaper abroad than at home. That is my second fear.

Mr. WEBB. I will say to my friend that you can have no bigger corporation, I think, than the United States Steel Trust, with $1,100,000,000 capital. In 1904 it sold its steel rails for about $27 in foreign countries and in the United States for $37. Since that time the steel rails have been rising in price in foreign countries and the price falling in the United States. That is stated in the opinion of the judge who wrote the opinion in the Steel Corporation case.

Mr. HARDY. This big aggregation, acting in combination, found it to its interest to sell steel rails six or ten dollars cheaper abroad than at home.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, I ask for three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FORDNEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARDY. Yes.

Mr. FORDNEY. I will say to the gentleman that Canada has a law that prevents the sale of goods in Canada at less price than they are sold in the country where they are made.

Mr. HARDY. If this bill were supplemented by a law that no manufacturer or producer in this country should sell his goods cheaper for export than for home consumption, I do not think there could be any objection to it.

Mr. WEBB. I do not know whether the gentleman was here two or three days ago when I gave an illustration as to copper. The producers sell their copper to the American people at 0.85 of a cent a pound higher than they are compelled to sell to these foreign-buying combinations in Europe. In other words, the European buys copper at nearly a cent a pound cheaper than the American manufacturer can buy it.

Mr. HARDY. I think that ought to be forbidden by law.

Mr. WEBB. We have no power to make the foreign buyer pay the same price Americans pay.

Mr. HARDY. That is right, but when the manufacturer wants to sell his goods, he ought to be ready and willing to give the American consumer just as low a price as he is willing to accept from anybody else, and it is on that theory I have been acting and talking as a Democrat all my life.

Mr. CULLOP. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARDY. I will.

Mr. CULLOP. Is there any reason why a producer in this country should be permitted to sell cheaper to a foreign consumer than to the home consumer, and if he does, is it not an outrage upon the home consumer?

Mr. HARDY. That is just exactly what I have been trying to express. If that man wants to sell his goods abroad, and can not do it without getting up on our backs in order to sell them cheaper abroad, he ought not to be permitted to do it.

Mr. CULLOP. And is it not more expensive to sell abroad than at home?

Mr. HARDY. Undoubtedly. I have tried to express the two fears that make me oppose this bill, although I approve its purpose.

I fear, first, that it will result in the formation of huge trading companies and associations of companies that will dominate the buying of all our exports, and by combination fix the price of our products to suit themselves, and, second, that that will result in the uniform practice of selling the products of our industries cheaper to the consumer abroad than at home. This legislation is too important, and its possible evil consequences seem too great to my mind for me to vote for it.

Mr. DILLON. Mr. Chairman, I want to make a few comments in reference to the meaning of the words "or merchandise exported, or in the course of being exported." Evidently, under the terms of this bill, an exporting company can go upon the home markets and buy products for exportation and ship them under the provisions of this bill.

I want to call the committee's attention to two or three facts that must be conceded. For instance, take cotton. The production in 1913 sold for $887,160,000. The exports of cotton for the same year amounted to $547,357,195. The export trade was 62 per cent. Bear that in mind.

Take wheat. The production in 1913 amounted to $610,122,000. The exports in the same year amounted to $89,036,428. In other words, 14 per cent of the wheat crop was exported. These figures exclude the manufacture of flour. Take the statement of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CLINE] a few minutes ago, in which he says the export trade in the manufactured products of this country is 30 per cent. I call attention to the fact that under the terms of this bill you propose to make it legal to form a trust for engaging in export trade in 62 per cent of your cotton. You propose to make it legal for the exporting trust to operate in the export of 14 per cent of your wheat. You propose in this bill to make it legal for the trust to engage in 30 per cent of your manufactured products. I want to know if the members of this committee are willing to turn their backs upon our antitrust law? Every line of this bill throws down the antitrust laws and throws the doors wide open so as to allow the exporting trust to purchase in the local markets the percentages that I have given. How will you convict any man under the antitrust laws that are now upon the statute books if you enact this law? I have never heard in all my legislative experience or legal experience of a legislative body legislating upon the percentage theory in reference to sale and commerce of commodities. Yet that is what you are doing if you enact this provision into law.

It seems to me that this bill will repeal the antitrust laws now upon the statute books, which ought not to be thrust aside until they are fully and adequately considered by this great legislative body.

I want to call your attention to another fact in reference to the wheat market. I have a little data. Take May wheat for the year 1905; there was 65 cents per bushel difference between high and low cost in the city of Minneapolis, while in the city of Chicago May wheat fluctuated 38½ cents per bushel for the same time.

I want to call your attention to the further fact that in 1912 the entire amount of wheat shipped into Chicago was only 35,914,000 bushels. Yet on the 28th day of July, 1914, in one day on the Chicago Board of Trade they sold more than 100,000,000 bushels.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from South Dakota has expired.

Mr. DILLON. Mr. Chairman, I did not speak upon the merits of the bill. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Dakota asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. DILLON. If it is very short, I will. I have some other things to say.

Mr. SMALL. It is just a question. Is the gentleman in favor of legislation that will increase the price of wheat to the farmer?

Mr. DILLON. I am; and I have always stood for laws that will prevent unlawful combinations.

I want to call attention to the fact that there is nothing in this bill that prevents these exporting companies from dealing in futures upon your cotton production or in any other form, if it is done for the purpose of exportation. There is no limitation here as to the exportation of these commodities. They can be gathered up from every source and stored in storehouses, in which you bring together a great combination of these products for purposes of exportation, and allow the trust to sell the exported goods in the foreign market more cheaply than they are sold in the local market.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit another interruption?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. DILLON. Certainly.

Mr. SMALL. Where is the price of wheat fixed—in the markets of the United States or in the markets of the world?

Mr. DILLON. I think it is fixed in both, if the gentleman wants my opinion on that stale old question that we are hearing here in every debate. I think it is fixed in both, but it is fixed in the world's market, so far as the percentage of export trade is concerned. I want to know if the gentleman wants to turn over 62 per cent of the cotton production of this country to these exporting trusts? If the gentleman wants to do that, we might just as well wipe off the statute books every sentence and every line of antitrust legislation. [Applause.]

Another proposition: You say there is no danger of these local combinations. In my State, in 1903, we passed what is known as the anticompact law as affecting insurance-combination rates, making it absolutely criminal for the insurance companies to combine on rates. Did it reach results? No. Every insurance company that was doing business in South Dakota would send a representative, a manager or secretary, to attend some banquet in Chicago or St. Paul, and they would select a leader of the banquet, and after the adjournment that leader would fix the rate that went into effect in South Dakota for that company, and every one that had sat around the banquet board followed suit. The result was that that law was rendered ineffective in its entirety, in every line of it.

Would you tear down these barriers that the people have sought to set up? It would be an impossibility for you to convict anybody, and I would like to have the lawyers upon this floor tell me how you will convict any individual for violating any antitrust law under the provisions of this act? When you arraign him before the bar of justice he would say, "I bought it for export trade." Who could dispute it? It lies in his own mind, in his own judgment, and you could not convict him. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from South Dakota has expired.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

Mr. KREIDER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to make a remark on the section.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn, and the Clerk will read the amendment to the section.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WINGO: Amend, page 1, line 8, after the word "manufacture," by inserting the following: "trading in or marketing."

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I have no inclination to undertake to discuss the general principles of the bill. I think those who propose this legislation will agree with me that the amendment I have suggested should go in. They may say that the words proposed are surplusage. That is the most in the way of objection that could be offered to my amendment.

The reasons I have in urging that these words be added are these: This bill deals solely with the question of exporting, trading in, or marketing goods in the export trade. It does not deal with production or manufacture. I repeat that. The object of your bill is to undertake to permit combinations in trading and marketing in export business. The bill distinctly says that. In the beginning it says, "Export trade, being solely within the meaning of this act trade or commerce," not production or manufacture. Yet when you come to undertake to prevent letting down the bars on domestic operations you simply say it shall not be deemed to include the "production or manufacture." Your bill has not undertaken to cover the question of production and manufacture. The bill covers trading in or marketing. So unless you say this bill shall not include trading and marketing in the United States, then you wipe out all the prohibitions except on production by the producer of the article or by the manufacturer, and leave the trading and marketing in the United States absolutely wide open with respect to any article where any part of it goes into the export trade.

Take, for instance, the illustration the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. DILLON] has just used, that of the wheat and the cotton crop; if you do not put in the words "marketing and trading," then your cotton factors who have their representatives here buying from the farmer, under British control, for the British Government, can form a combination by which they could control the price of cotton. The same is true with respect to wheat. They could come in and say, "You do not undertake to penalize us at all." You undertake to exclude one, and so you include the others. You do not inhibit or outlaw the trading in wheat or marketing of these other products.

For that reason I think you should certainly put the proposed words into the statute, because otherwise you will defeat the object you have in mind.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

I have been very much impressed by the remarks of the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. DILLON] and of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO]. I look upon this bill as being a very dangerous thing—something like a suit case filled with dynamite. It is practically impossible to figure out the possibilities that there are in this measure or just what effect it is going to have. It is a dangerous piece of legislation, and it seems to me that we ought to approach it with great caution.

Take for illustration the marketing of cotton, a commodity with which it happens that I am somewhat familiar. The cotton is grown by the farmer, and it is sold to the merchant in the town or city, who in turn sells it to the exporter, who buys it to fill orders that he has received from London, Hamburg, Paris, or some other foreign market. The export business in cotton fixes the price of the product. At the outside the business is under the control of a few dozen exporters. It is easily possible for those exporters to combine together. The inevitable tendency of this law will be the formation of a combination upon the part of exporters of cotton, and the result will be that the producer will be oppressed. There will be always a tendency to secure a larger margin of profit for the middleman, for the exporter. He will be able to fill his orders, not in competition with other exporters, but in conspiracy and in combination with them. Do you think that exporters who have combined together for the purpose of making sales and taking orders for cotton from spinners in foreign countries will separate and bid against each other when it comes to supplying themselves with the cotton wherewith to fill those orders? It is not at all reasonable that they will do so.

Mr. Chairman, the tendency is inevitable that the taking of orders for cotton from foreign spinners will pass into the hands of a single little group of men sitting around a table, the orders will be apportioned out among them, the price that they will pay for it will be fixed and agreed on and their profits set apart for themselves, and there will be absolutely no competition among those exporters in buying the product of our southern fields.

What I have said as to cotton applies with equal force to wheat and all the great commodities of the farm. It applies to the products of the factories. For instance, take automobiles. As soon as we pass this measure the leading manufacturers of automobiles will combine together to control the export trade. The foreign market and demand will pass into the hands of this little group of men, and their competitors will be excluded from it. The result will be that the manufacturer of automobiles who is not in the combination will lose his market for automobiles in foreign countries. He will be driven out of business or forced to depend upon the local market. He will be compelled to sell out his business to some competitor or to retire from business, and the whole thing will be detrimental to American industry.

Gentlemen, this is a dangerous measure. We can not see where it is going to reach. I would as lief have it possible for men to combine to sell to the American consumer as to have them combine in buying from the American producer. What is the difference? I fail to see it.

Mr. Chairman, the objects of antitrust laws are twofold. One is to protect the consumers, to save them from exploitation by the manufacturers and middlemen. That is one of the great purposes of the antitrust law. But that is not the only purpose. Another great purpose is to protect the producer from a great combine of purchasers, to protect the small manufacturer, the small dealer, and give them a chance to compete on fair terms. It is true we care nothing about the exploitation of foreign peoples by our own people who have something to sell. However, we should have some regard for our producers who may be forced to sell their products of farm and factory to exporters who have entered into an oppressive and unjust combination to depress prices.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KREIDER. Mr. Chairman, I do not know that the Webb bill now under consideration is going to be of any material assistance in securing foreign business, but I do not think it can do any possible harm, and shall therefore support the bill.

I am glad to see that at least some members of the Democratic Party at last seem to recognize the importance of securing as large a share of foreign business as possible; but I notice that some of them are very much concerned for fear that some large corporation might take on business at a price which is less than the prevailing price in America. I would gather from the remarks of the gentleman from Texas that he would be willing to go to the extent of enacting legislation that would provide a jail sentence for anyone found guilty of taking an order from a foreign customer at a less price than he had sold similar goods in America. I do not doubt the honesty or conscientiousness of the gentleman, but I would like to ask the gentleman from Texas whether he does not think it would be good policy for a large manufacturer who might find it necessary in order to maintain his operating expenses at the lowest point to run his factory to its fullest capacity, and not finding a market for all of his production here, I say, would it not be good policy for such a concern to take on a certain volume of foreign business even though the price was a little less than that prevailing here?

Mr. HARDY. I would like to say that it would take 10 minutes to answer the gentleman; but I think it is a sufficient answer to say it is not better.

Mr. KREIDER. Mr. Chairman, it is needless to say that I do not agree with the gentleman, but, as I said in the beginning, I am glad to know that at last the Democratic Party is going on record and seems to be interested in securing foreign business for our country; but why are you not equally interested in retaining our home market?

Why are you willing to surrender our own market to the foreigner by the enacting of a near-free-trade tariff bill?

Mr. HARDY. Is not the gentleman in favor of the anti-dumping clause?

Mr. KREIDER. I am in favor of anything that keeps any article manufactured in a foreign country out of this country, provided we can manufacture that article here and in so doing give employment to the wage earners at a remunerative price. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. HARDY. But the gentleman wants to do in foreign countries what he wants to prohibit in his own.

Mr. KREIDER. I want to give employment to all of our wage earners, and it is high time that we take steps to accomplish that end. The gentleman knows that after the war ends in Europe the bread line will form, mills will shut down, unless there is a change of the tariff laws that are now on the statute books, and I might say here and now that these tariff laws are far more important than appear, perhaps, on the surface. They are, I might say, directly responsible for the various revenue bills being enacted. The recent revenue bill passed by this House, and also now passed by the Senate, the conference report of which will probably be brought to this House on Tuesday next, is made necessary partly because of the repealing of the Payne Tariff Act by the Democratic Party and partly because of the extravagant and needless appropriations passed by this administration. Personally, I am not so much opposed to the various provisions of the revenue bill itself, but I am opposed to the policy which has made the introduction of such a bill necessary.

On July 6, when this revenue measure was first presented in the House by the distinguished and able leader of the majority [Mr. KITCHIN], he, in behalf of the Democratic Party, repeatedly challenged this side of the House, in case we would not support this bill, to say how or what the Republican Party would have done or would do were they in power. He called our attention to the fact that we voted for the increased amounts carried in the fortification, the Army, and the Navy bills, and said he was now anxious to see whether we would be willing to vote also for the bill imposing the taxes to raise the necessary revenue.

I admit the question is pertinent, and he was justified in propounding it, and I shall be glad to answer it. I shall not only answer it in a general way, but specifically. I shall supply actual facts and figures and in such a simple manner that every Democratic Member of this House can understand. In doing so I shall not use figures of my own making, but figures supplied by the various governmental departments, all of which are under the direct control of the party in power.

I admit that I supported and voted for the preparedness measures to which he refers, but I may as well say right here and now I shall not vote for the imposition of additional burdens upon the people.

I will show, as he has challenged us, that if the Republicans were in power the revenues of the Government under existing law would be ample to provide for all the preparedness measures voted for by us. The truth is, that the money that you propose to raise by imposing these taxes is needed—

First. Because you squandered a large portion of the revenue of the Government by wasteful, needless, and extravagant appropriations.

Second. Because you repealed the Payne tariff law and substituted therefor the Underwood bill, which has proven an absolute failure as a revenue producer, and not, as you say, to make up the deficit caused by the preparedness program demanded by the people.

In the Sixty-third Congress you did the same thing; you needlessly squandered the revenue of the Government to the extent of over $100,000,000 and then levied, over our most emphatic protest, a so-called "war tax" intended to raise the money thus taken from the Treasury. You at that time promised to repeal this war tax in a year, but instead of repealing it you now come with another tax bill intended to raise about $200,000,000—to be exact, $197,000,000—and then boldly challenge us, asking what we would have done or do were we in power. I will tell you, and in doing so I shall use the figures of the year ending June 30, 1913, the last year the Republicans were responsible for legislation and appropriations, and compare these figures with the year ending June 30, 1916, for which the Democratic Party was responsible for legislation and appropriations.

First, what do the increased appropriations you speak of amount to? They are, of course, we admit, very large. For your benefit I shall give the amount appropriated in 1916 and 1917 in each of the three bills, and also the increase carried by each, as well as the totals. They are as follows:

	1916	1917	Increase
Army bill	$101,974,195.87	$267,596,330.10	$165,622,134.23
Navy bill	149,661,864.88	313,300,095.84	163,638,230.96
Fortifications bill	6,060,216.90	25,747,550.00	19,687,333.10
Total	257,696,277.65	606,644,175.94	348,947,898.29

This is an increase, as you will notice, of nearly $349,000,000; a very large amount indeed. The question now arises, as Mr. KITCHIN puts it, "What would we do, or have done, to get this money without levying extra taxation?"

Well, let us see what our income is and has been, comparing 1913 with 1916. In order to show this entirely clear, I have taken the following figures, showing the receipts and disbursements of the Government on all items for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1913, to June 30, 1916, inclusive. These figures are from the Treasury reports, and are as follows:

NOTE.—Figures for 1915 subject to slight change after final revision of accounts.

You will notice that the total receipts for 1916 were $840,940,438.08, as compared with $747,512,079.84 for 1913, the last year under Republican control, showing an increase of $93,428,758.24. This balance can be applied to make up part of this deficit, provided you had not appropriated more than the Republicans did when they were in power and responsible for appropriations; and I do not recall that in any of your campaign literature you accused the Republicans of not appropriating enough. You also would, in addition, have had a nice little balance, which I have not taken into consideration, in the Panama Canal disbursements. You will notice that in 1913 the Panama Canal disbursements amounted to $41,741,258.03, whereas in 1916 they amounted to only $17,503,728.07. In other words, there was a saving in these expenditures of over $24,000,000. There was also a saving of over $17,000,000 in the pension appropriations. To be exact, in 1913 they were $175,085,450.29; for 1917 they are $158,065,000. So that if your appropriations would have exceeded the appropriations made by the Republicans in 1913 even to the extent of $41,000,000, you would still have an increased revenue, to which I have referred, of over $93,000,000. You will notice that I am extremely liberal and more than fair in making these calculations. I do this because there is legitimate extra expense attached to the administrative offices because of the natural growth of the country, but this allowance will easily provide for such natural growth or expansion and is extremely liberal.

Now, let us consider the customs receipts; that is, the amount of our importations and the revenue collected. In this case, again to be perfectly fair, I shall quote the figures for a period of six years from 1911 to 1916, inclusive, and shall give the amount of revenue collected under the Payne bill for three years, including 1913, and the Underwood bill for three years, including 1916, and shall give the amount of importations, the revenue, the per cent of articles coming in on the free list, and the average rate on all imports. They are as follows:

Year.	Imports.	Revenues.	Per cent free.	Average rate, dutiable imports	Average rate, all imports
1911	1,527,226,137	$314,497,371	60.84	31.2	20.22
1912	1,653,264,934	311,721,672	63.33	40.12	18.85
1913	1,813,008,354	318,813,994	64.57	40.05	17.69
1914	1,893,025,657	292,128,528	59.53	37.60	14.88
1915	1,674,169,740	209,268,109	61.77	33.43	12.40
1916	2,197,885,510	311,866,222	67.31	0.04	9.72

It may be interesting and I shall quote the imports and revenues for each month for the years 1913 and 1916, because it is these two years from which we make our comparison, 1913 being the last year the Payne law was in force, and in 1916 the Underwood bill being in force. They are as follows:

Month.	Fiscal year ending June 30, 1913.		Fiscal year ending June 30, 1916.
	Value.	Revenue.	Value.	Revenue.
July	$148,665,738	$28,136,730	$143,244,237	$14,185,943
August	154,756,770	30,205,332	141,804,202	15,780,541
September	144,819,493	25,475,128	151,236,026	14,923,640
October	177,987,986	30,116,824	149,172,729	17,936,581
November	153,024,808	25,666,454	155,496,675	17,082,213
December	154,095,444	24,248,161	171,832,505	16,893,087
January	163,063,431	29,334,124	184,350,942	17,543,535
February	149,513,915	27,995,111	193,935,117	19,239,535
March	155,445,498	27,457,489	213,580,785	20,984,386
April	146,194,461	23,693,986	218,236,997	18,926,853
May	133,723,713	20,434,749	229,134,097	21,184,486
June	131,245,877	23,688,900	245,806,779	19,914,386

I want to call your attention first to the fact that the importations for 1911 amounted to $1,527,226,105; in 1913, they amounted to $1,813,008,234; now, in 1916, they amounted to $2,197,883,510.

It was generally supposed that our protective tariff prohibited foreign goods being shipped into this market, and that, under the Underwood bill, these importations would greatly increase. If you will take time to ascertain the increase in importations from 1911 to 1913, you will find they amounted to $285,782,129, or an average increase per year of $142,891,064. Now, the increase from 1913 to 1916 is $384,875,275, or an average annual increase for the three years of only $128,291,755. I simply make mention of this fact and draw your attention to it because of the contrary assertions constantly made on the floor of this House. It is the tax collected in which we are particularly interested at this time. In 1913, you will notice, we collected $318,891,396; in 1916, we collected $211,866,222, a loss of over one-third of the entire revenue, namely $107,025,174.

And the rate, as you will notice, dropped from 17.69 in 1913 to 9.72, nearly 50 per cent. Now, assuming and again giving our Democratic friends the benefit of every possible doubt that had the Republicans remained in power there is no doubt but the Payne or a similar protective tariff bill would have been in force, and assuming that the increase in importations would not have increased any faster than they did under Democratic administration, but they would have, because the country would have been in a more prosperous condition; but assuming, as I said, that they would have amounted to $2,200,000,000, and the rate would have dropped to even 17 per cent, we find the revenue collected would amount to $374,000,000, instead of $211,866,222, showing an increase of $162,133,778. This is certainly a conservative estimate of the customs receipts had the Republicans been in power—no Democrat will deny that the Republicans would have retained a protective tariff law on the statute books. Now, let us see what, at least, some of the needless and extravagant appropriations are which I have referred to. I want to be specific and shall name at least a few of them and enough of them to answer my purpose. Perhaps the most needless and uncalled for of all is the appropriation of $20,000,000 for a nitrate plant for the benefit and at the request of a few prominent southern Democrats which amounts to really throwing so much money away, certainly under Republican rule not a dollar would have been appropriated for this purpose.

Next is the $10,000,000 appropriation for an armor-plate plant. In view of the fact that offers were made to the Government by private concerns to furnish armor plate to the Government at actual cost, this appropriation was absolutely needless and was opposed by the Republicans.

Next is the $50,000,000 appropriation for a ship-purchase bill which has been fought most strenuously by the Republicans, and had they been in power this certainly would not have been made.

Next is the appropriation of $40,598,135 for rivers and harbors.

Now, in my calculations I have already made provision for a rivers and harbors bill such as was passed by the Republicans when they were in power; but, again, to be liberal we will assume that owing to necessary improvements we would need $20,000,000 more for this project than was appropriated in 1913 by Republicans. This would still effect a saving of over $20,000,000 on this item.

You also voted $45,000,000 to be dumped into the mouth of the Mississippi River. Now, the North has always been generous with the South, and no doubt the Republican Party would have been most generous with you and might have given you $20,000,000; but even so, there would have been a saving of at least $25,000,000 on this item.

And last, but not least, notwithstanding your frequent and constant assertions of needless expenditures and the creation of needless positions under Republican administrations, saying in your platform in 1912—

> We denounce the profligate waste of the money wrung from the people by oppressive taxation through the lavish appropriations of recent Republican Congresses which have kept taxes high and reduced the purchasing power of the people's toil. We demand a return to that simplicity and economy which befits a democratic Government, and a reduction in the number of useless offices, the salaries of which drain the substance of the people.

You created over 30,000 new positions to take care of "deserving Democrats," for which you appropriated on various bills fully $36,000,000. I have looked over your Democratic platform adopted in St. Louis in 1916 to see what you say on the question of economy, and I find these words:

> We demand careful economy in expenditures for the support of the Government, and to that end favor a return by the House of Representatives to its former practice of initiating and preparing all appropriation bills through a single committee chosen from its membership, in order that responsibility may be centered, expenditures standardized and made uniform, and waste and duplication in the public service as much as possible avoided.

If this is what you favor, and if it results in economy, why in the world do not you do it? You have control of the Senate and of the House and have the presidential office; there is nothing in the world to prevent you from exercising any and all economies you want; the Republicans can not prevent it; and, unfortunately, the Republicans have not been able to prevent you from squandering the money, as I have already clearly shown. I need go no further, and yet I might go on enumerating smaller items which, in the aggregate, will run into the millions. But let us again ask the question, What would the Republicans do were they in power? I will answer by saying, first:

We would apply our increased income under existing law, to which I have referred and pointed out, that, as between 1913 and 1916, amounts to over		$893,000,000
We would use the increased revenue which would have been collected at the customhouses had a Republican tariff remained on the statute books, amounting to over		162,000,000
Under a Republican administration we would certainly have made the following savings in appropriations:
Nitrate plant	$20,000,000
Armor-plate plant	10,000,000
Ship-purchase bill	50,000,000
Rivers and harbors	20,000,000
Flood control	25,000,000
Extra, needless employees	36,000,000
Total saving of		161,000,000
Total		416,000,000
The extra appropriations carried in the fortification and Army and Navy bills amount to a little less than		349,000,000
This will leave an excess balance in the Treasury of over		67,000,000

Now, try to remember that in these calculations I have allowed an amount equal to all appropriations of every name and nature made by the Republicans when they were in power, and have given you an extra allowance of $41,000,000 which you saved in the pension bills and Panama Canal disbursements, which would be ample to cover any legitimate increased costs of operations. Furthermore, I have used your figures, supplied by your departments, which are positive and, I believe, correct. The only calculation I made was on the probable income of a tariff law; but in this, you must admit, I have been extremely conservative, using as a basis for my figures an amount which is less than the normal increase was during the operation of the Payne tariff law, and applied an average rate of income that is less than your figures show to have actually been collected. But perhaps you prefer that I should use the figures given by the distinguished gentleman from North Carolina when he introduced the bill on this floor on July 6 last; you may think that perhaps, in some manner, I have endeavored to hoodwink you. So we will take his figures and apply Republican management and legislation and see what result we get.

On July 6, after Mr. KITCHIN had spent considerable time in explaining to the apparent satisfaction of his Democratic colleagues that the Underwood bill was not a failure as a revenue producer, but was actually producing more revenue than the Payne bill would have done had it remained on the statute books, and, in his dignified and pleasing manner, explained the absolute necessity of the passage of this bill, he said:

> The inquiry now is, How much additional revenue is required to be raised, and how does this bill raise it? In estimating the actual disbursements it is proper to deduct the sinking-fund requirement included in the permanent appropriations at $60,727,000 for the fiscal year 1917, and also the postal appropriations estimated at $324,723,000, payable from postal revenues. It is also safe to deduct, as is the custom in making such estimates of expenditures from the total estimated appropriations remaining after these deductions, an amount equivalent to 5 per cent of such total, as experience shows that about 5 per cent of the appropriations calling for the payment of money is unexpended at the end of each fiscal year. It has been the custom in making estimates of amount of required revenue to make the sinking fund and the 5 per cent deductions, as explained. This was done by the committee that reported the Payne bill in making estimates under that bill.
> We have prepared a statement showing these deductions, including the estimate of $125,000,000 to be met by bond issue, the estimated ordinary disbursements for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and the estimated receipts under existing laws, together with the estimated additional revenue required to meet the ordinary disbursements for the year, which I shall read:

Total estimated appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917		$1,379,000,000
Deduct amount, included in the estimate of total appropriation, because of the Mexican situation, to be financed by bonds	$125,000,000
Deduct sinking-fund requirement	60,727,000
Deduct postal appropriations, payable from postal revenues	324,723,000
		510,450,000
Balance		1,068,550,000

Deduct 5 per cent of the balance, the amount estimated to be unexpended		$53,428,000
Amount for which it is necessary to provide revenue		1,015,122,000
Estimated revenue under present laws:
Customs	$230,000,000
Internal revenue—
Ordinary	303,000,000
Income tax	120,000,000
Emergency	41,000,000
Miscellaneous	54,200,000
		748,200,000
Estimated excess of disbursements over receipts		266,922,000

We will need, therefore, to meet the fiscal year's appropriations $266,922,000 more than the present revenue laws will produce.

This bill raises, first, by the income tax, extra, I mean, $107,000,000; by the inheritance or estate tax for the first year, $17,000,000; and after that it is estimated that it will raise $54,000,000 annually; from the tax on the manufacture of munitions of war it is estimated that we will raise $71,000,000; and from miscellaneous taxes, additional $2,000,000, which total $197,000,000, leaving $69,922,000 necessary to make good the $266,922,000 for which we are to provide.

Now, instead of levying a tax in this bill for this remaining $69,922,000, we propose to take that amount from the general balance fund.

Very well, we will take his figures. He tells us we need, in round numbers, $267,000,000. I want to call your attention to the fact that in my calculations I treated only specifically the three preparedness measures, namely, the fortification, Navy, and Army appropriation bills. He also uses, as you will notice, the full amount of all appropriations in all departments. Now, then, to be perfectly fair, I shall not take into consideration the increased revenue, amounting to over $93,000,000, to which I first called your attention. However, you will also notice that he does not claim that this bill will make good the deficit. He tells us that this bill will only provide revenue amounting to $197,000,000, but says the balance, approximately $70,000,000—to be exact, $69,922,000—can and will be taken from the Treasury balance. In the course of his splendid remarks and the multiplication of figures and his remarkable but unsuccessful effort to defend the Underwood tariff bill as a revenue producer, he raises his deficit in some manner or another from $267,000,000 to $274,000,000, a mere trifle of $7,000,000. However, we shall overlook this. In one of the many challenges to this side of the House he uses these words:

> Where would you gentlemen get the money if you were in power, and how would you raise the necessary cash? If the Republicans in this House know a better way and a wiser way and a more patriotic way to get this $274,000,000 extra appropriation for which they have voted, then it will be their duty, as it ought to be their pleasure, to make a motion to recommit with instructions to put their measure into the bill and let it go into the RECORD, so that all the people can know their method of levying and producing this extra amount of taxes. [Applause in the Democratic side.] If you gentlemen of the Republican side will offer an amendment or a motion to recommit, setting out a specific method as a substitute for the method of the pending bill, I pledge you no point of order will be made against it, and you shall have the right of going on record for it.

We shall be delighted to tell him what we would have done were we in power, and I am sure it would have been "a better way, a wiser way, and a more patriotic way." For, had we been in power and Republican laws on the statute books and Republican care and judgment exercised in making appropriations, we would have had plenty of revenue without levying extra taxes. I have already said that he does not claim this bill will raise the $274,000,000, but only $197,000,000; the balance of $77,000,000 is to be taken out of the Treasury. I say $77,000,000, because the shortage when he started to speak was only $269,922,000, but has automatically expanded itself to $274,000,000, an increase of $7,000,000.

Now, what would we have done or what could we do?

We would raise by a reasonable and equitable tariff law our customs receipts on the importations of foreign-made goods a revenue amounting to at least $374,000,000, whereas his estimate of the receipts of the customhouses is only $230,000,000. We would show a gain here on this item of $144,000,000. We would cut out the needless and extravagant appropriations to which I have referred and which are contained in his total estimate of $1,579,000,000, which amount to, as enumerated in detail, $161,000,000, making a total increase in our revenue on hand of $305,000,000. From this it would be easy to deduct the amount it is intended to raise by this bill, namely, $197,000,000, leaving an extra balance in the Treasury of $108,000,000. Or, if you like it better, we would pay the entire deficit to which he calls our attention, amounting to $274,000,000, and we would still have a balance for the Treasury amounting to $31,000,000, as against depleting the Treasury balance, as is proposed, to the extent of $77,000,000.

You may note what appears a discrepancy in the final result of both sets of figures, because I show a net Treasury balance of $67,000,000, whereas now I show only a balance of $31,000,000, using Mr. KITCHIN's figures. This is accounted for, first, in my estimate I have used the actual figures of the customs receipts for 1916, amounting to $211,000,000, whereas in his figures he estimates the customs receipts at $230,000,000, making a difference of $19,000,000. In my estimate I treat only the fortifications, Army, and Navy bills, and call attention to the difference in the amount in the pension bill and Panama Canal disbursements of $41,000,000. In his estimate these items are included, and all increased appropriations are included, and I might state here that these increases in the other bills which I have not specifically named amount to in the neighborhood of $60,000,000; but as there is a saving of $41,000,000 in the two bills named, there is an excess appropriation of about $20,000,000, so that if these figures are all taken into consideration, we arrive at about the same result.

Mr. Chairman, the trouble with the financiers of the Democratic Party is that their minds seem to be "single-track-" minds only and run only in one direction, and that is in the direction of spending money and then levying taxes to make up the shortage. I am not at all surprised at the boldness of the challenge. No doubt the Democratic Party feels that they have managed the affairs of the Nation as well as anyone could; but the truth is they have made an absolute failure, for which the people of the country are compelled to pay hundreds of millions of dollars. I have never known a business man or a corporation to fail and have the manager admit that the failure was due to his ignorance of business affairs. The claim is always that it is either the other fellow's fault or the conditions were such that he could not overcome them; yet the truth is that with competent business management other managers under similar conditions manage successfully. So it is with this administration. You have squandered the money, as I have clearly and specifically shown you, by extravagant appropriations and have depleted the income of the Government by ill-considered, un-American legislation, and now, under the pretext of a preparedness program, you ask us to vote to tax the people to make up the deficit. Herein lies the difference between the policy of the Democratic and Republican Parties. The Democratic Party has always been a mere pretending party; it has never lived up to its professions and always shown its total inefficiency whenever there was an opportunity. Of course, we know that the Democratic Party is opposed to a protective tariff and will probably continue to be opposed, notwithstanding the fact that it is so desirable from the standpoint of raising revenue, but even more desirable and beneficial in building up the industries of this country.

Mr. Chairman, there is no law that has ever been placed upon the statute books that has a more direct effect upon the industrial activities of the Nation than the tariff law. A protective tariff has never failed to stimulate industrial development and provide ample opportunities for the wage earner, whereas a near free trade or "tariff for revenue only" has always had the directly opposite effect, the Underwood bill being no exception to that rule. The evidence is positive and recent.

You can not have forgotten the terrible blighting effect of the Underwood tariff law during the 10 months in which it was in operation under normal conditions upon the industry of the country and upon the wage earners in particular.

You remember how the steel mills drew their fires; how the woolen mills retrenched; how many cotton mills were forced out of business; factories that remained open reduced their output; stocks depreciated, it is estimated, over $1,000,000 per day.

The bread line formed in all the principal cities of the country, in New York alone 500,000 being in line and in Chicago over 200,000.

Suffering was terrible, and charitable associations were taxed to their utmost.

It was estimated that 3,000,000 wage earners were idle, and the loss in wages approximated close to $10,000,000 per day.

Three hundred and fifty thousand freight cars were idle, with a like proportion of locomotives.

In Harrisburg, in my district, not less than 144 trains were taken off by the Pennsylvania Co. alone.

Forty per cent of the railroad mileage was in the hands of receivers.

Dividends were passed.

You certainly can not have forgotten how financial failures multiplied, the closing of the stock exchange, the export of our gold, and—

Do you remember how your "great (?) President" became alarmed, and his son-in-law, the distinguished Secretary of the Treasury, asked England to send representatives, with the hope that some kind of an arrangement or agreement might be entered into to pay the $400,000,000 we owed and had no way of paying, except by the exportation of gold, which would have required fully one-half of the entire visible supply in America? You know how glad you were when England finally sent her commissioners, among whom was Sir Walter Baish, and you finally succeeded in making some sort of a makeshift, temporary arrangement, which fortunately lasted until the war broke out and relieved the conditions.

Have you forgotten that in those days—yes; less than two short years ago—American dollars, due entirely to your legislation, were at a heavy discount, $7 at one time being required to offset an English pound worth $4.86?

Do you recall how mortgages were foreclosed on a scale almost unknown before?

Have you forgotten how the bank balances melted away?

Can you remember how your "great President" called both Houses of Congress in joint session on September 4, 1914, and told us to levy extra taxes on the people, so as to avoid a deficit in the Treasury, which we were rapidly approaching?

And do you recall that on that very day there was on deposit $75,000,000 in various banking institutions throughout the country which you were afraid to withdraw on account of the critical financial situation then prevailing in the United States?

We told you these things would happen if the Underwood bill became a law. We were then called "calamity howlers." Now, I am reciting "history," and no one knows it better than you do.

But the truth is that the Democratic Party when they acquired control of the finances of this Government was drunk with power—power that was conferred by a minority of the voters—and you were determined to run this Government upon "pet theories" instead of "past experiences."

When President Wilson was signing this bill, destined to cause sorrow in America and joy in Europe, he said, among a great many other things, to the jubilant coterie that had received special invitations to witness the deed, "I feel a very peculiar pleasure in what I have just done, by way of taking part in a piece of business," and so forth.

It certainly was a great "piece of business." It caused great rejoicing and favorable comment in Europe, but its effect soon spread gloom and despair in America, and when the American people began to rise in righteous indignation at the betrayal of their interests, the ex-Princeton professor cheered them by the comforting assurance that all their troubles were purely "psychological." It was simply a "state of mind."

Oh, yes; the workingmen, women, and children standing in the bread lines everywhere were not hungry, they just "thought they were."

The children were not compelled to go unclothed and unfed, they only "thought they were."

The mills and factories had not shut down, they only "thought" they had. Great, indeed, is psychology; but, alas, it does not pay the rent nor doctor's bills nor grocer's bills. While it may revive the drooping spirits for a moment, it does not satisfy the craving of an empty stomach.

During the fall and winter of 1913 we were told by the sympathetic, kind-hearted, and energetic Redfield that a thorough investigation of actual conditions had been made by his department of the Government, and he assured us that by January 1 there would be a general resumption of activities in all of our industries. We waited. January 1 came, but the resumption of the activities in our industries was only "psychological." Then we were given to understand that a few cogs had slipped in the machinery that was to bring us prosperity and we were asked to wait until March 1, when we were assured that every wheel and every spindle in every mill throughout the country would begin to turn.

We waited—March 1 came, but the wheels and spindles refused to turn.

Then, it was May 1, when the sun in the heavens was to become invisible because of the smoke from the chimneys of our mills and factories. We again waited—May 1 came, but no smoke, only hot air. We were then assured if we would only possess our souls with patience until July 1 we would be overtaken by prosperity, but on July 1 the only prosperity in evidence was "psychological."

It was then explained to us that the "piece of business" which the President took such extreme delight in putting on the statute books had not yet been on the statute books a sufficient length of time to "bring" prosperity; but every man, woman, and child in this country, including the great ex-professor, knew it had been long enough in force to "destroy" prosperity.

After this the European war came, and with it has come a temporary prosperity which is entirely abnormal and is solely and entirely due to the demands for American products to supply the needs and necessities of the warring nations of Europe. Every sensible human being knows that the prosperity we now enjoy will last only so long as the war lasts. It is a fictitious and artificial prosperity that will disappear on the day that peace is declared, and I hope that God may speed the day. I do not want this country to prosper at the expense of the grief-stricken and heartbroken widows and orphans of the Old World. I do not welcome and can not rejoice in a prosperity that is based upon the sorrows and misfortunes of our kindred across the seas. The very thought of coining money out of the blood, the tears, and the suffering of humanity is abhorrent to the American people. Our sympathy goes out to the mothers of Europe, and I would to God we might be able to lift from them this burden of sorrow, grief, and pain.

Ah, my Democratic friends, when you boast of the prosperity now with us, do not turn a deaf ear to the moans and groans of the wounded and dying.

When you boast of our exportations—the product of our munition factories—look across the seas and glance at the bleak white walls of the dreary hospitals filled to overflowing with human beings, "the noblest creation of God," maimed, mutilated, suffering intense pain and agony.

When you boast of our temporary prosperity, will you not look at the pinched, pallid face of the soldier boy and hear him murmur the blessed name of "mother" as his young life comes to a premature and untimely end and his soul wings its flight to God?

Talk not to us of prosperity that is eating out the very heart of our boasted Christian civilization—a prosperity that makes a mockery of all the nobler instincts and sentiments of the human race, a prosperity that is based on hate and defies the heaven-sent message, "Peace on earth, good will to men."

Mr. Chairman, we demand legislation that will bring prosperity to this country after the war; prosperity that is based upon sound, economic laws; a prosperity that is a blessing to all humanity, a prosperity that brings cheer and joy and love and peace in the homes, hearts, and souls of men; prosperity such as we enjoyed prior to 1913; a prosperity such as we always enjoyed under a wise protective tariff law.

Mr. Chairman, I shall not pause to defend the protective tariff policy of the Republican Party. The history of our internal development is its defense. It has stood the test. It has brought its blessings into every home and it will again bring its blessings to this great beloved country of ours, when the Republican Party again assumes control of our National Government on March 4, 1917.

Mr. Chairman, I feel that I have slightly diverted from the direct subject of finance which I started to discuss. If you will remember the quotation I cited of the distinguished gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN], you will notice he included in the deduction from the general appropriations an item of $125,000,000, which is not provided for in either of my calculations. He told us that to provide for this item the administration proposes to issue bonds. This item is for the purpose of carrying on the war—no, not war; "he kept us out of war"—to carry on our "watchful-wobbling" policy with Mexico.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, this opens up the Mexican situation. I shall not at this time speak on this subject, but in the near future, I hope to address the House on our relations with Mexico. I will pause, however, long enough to say that this whole so-called "Mexican question" is one of our own creation. Except for the attitude of Woodrow Wilson there would be no Mexican question at all and, as a consequence, there would be no $125,000,000 appropriation to provide for, nor one of $50,000,000 already provided for; nor expenditures of many millions to be provided for in the future. But for that "watchful-wobbling" policy, there would have been no demands to salute our flag necessary, there would have been no need of sending our fleet to Vera Cruz, there would have been no funerals of our brave sailor boys in New York or elsewhere.

My friends, when the final chapter of this Mexican situation has been written by the impartial historian the action and conduct of this Government will cause every American with red blood in his veins and a reverence for the Stars and Stripes to blush with shame. This chapter will be the only humiliating chapter in all our splendid American history. Would to God we were able to rub it out.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto close in eight minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto close in eight minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, except for the fallacious argument that the gentleman from Pennsylvania makes as to the protective tariff, he made a very good presentation in behalf of the bill.

I desire in these few minutes to take up some arguments that have been made that this bill will affect injuriously the prices of agricultural products, of which I might take as examples the cotton crop of the South and the wheat crop of the West. The prices of these staple products are fixed in the markets of the world. Unless our producers of raw agricultural products have a free opportunity of exporting them to meet the demand, then the prices in our own country will be depressed and the producers will suffer thereby.

This bill is not intended so much for the benefit of the exporters of raw products; they can take care of themselves. The prices are fixed in the world-wide market; there will be bidders for them when there is a demand, and buyers at the prevailing market prices.

The chief purpose of this bill is to aid the little manufacturer, not the large manufacturers who export, like the International Harvester Co., the Standard Oil Co., the United States Steel Corporation; they have the financial ability to advertise and further their interests in the foreign market, to do the necessary advertising, to exploit their goods and bring them to the attention of the buyers with patience, money, and with skill, and await their opportunities, and thereby to compete with the manufacturers of other countries in the selling of their products. But the little manufacturer, the small corporation, for instance, engaged in producing iron and steel products——

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMALL. Not now, but in a moment. He can not afford to expend the necessary amount to exploit his goods, to advertise them, and maintain the necessary staff in order to put them before the foreign market. Now I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Does not the gentleman know that the Steel Trust has practically no competition, that they have got a gentleman's agreement in armor plate and steel rails? Does not the gentleman also know that the small business man of the country is at the mercy of the big trusts now, and will be if this bill is passed, in the export trade?

Mr. SMALL. From my information I am not prepared to admit the United States Steel Corporation dominates the production of iron and steel in the United States. There are others——

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Has the gentleman read the Stanley steel company report?

Mr. SMALL. Yes.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. And in the face of that information the gentleman does not believe it dominates the iron and steel business of the country?

Mr. SMALL. Not to the extent of being a monopoly.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Oh!

Mr. SMALL. This bill does not affect that subject, is not intended to affect it in the slightest degree. If the gentleman is correct, if they have a monopoly in the iron and steel trade, this bill does not change it and could not change it. What this bill does is to say to the small manufacturer of any product, where there is an export demand, that he may combine with manufacturers of a like product, pool their product, put up the necessary money for the purpose of exploiting them and to put them in competition with foreign producers and to do the necessary things to find a market for the products. This bill is in the interest of the little manufacturer and is not intended for the large manufacturer.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMALL. For a question.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Then in harmony with what the gentleman states, would he vote for an amendment which would restrict the application of this law in a certain way—that is, to concerns that have a certain amount of capital stock, or concerns that have an annual output of, say, a million dollars, or five hundred thousand dollars, or something else? Would the gentleman be willing to vote for an amendment that would restrict it to the small concerns?

Mr. SMALL. Oh, the gentleman and I look at this thing differently. It is the same old question——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SMALL. I would ask for two minutes more.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. I would ask that the gentleman have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The time has already been fixed by the committee.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Chairman, let me extend to my friend from Texas [Mr. EAGLE] my congratulations on the splendid encomium pronounced by him on successful, legitimate business enterprise. For a number of years this Nation of ours has looked

Mr. HICKS. For a number of years this Nation has looked forward with hope and confident expectation to the time when our export trade, especially to the Republics south of us, might be extended and enlarged. With conscious pride we look back to that splendid past when American ships were upon every sea and the America flag floated in every harbor of the globe. That those days may return is the fervent hope of everyone, and I believe, Mr. Speaker, that this bill will speed the time. [Applause.] Our business men, be they large or be they small, be they farmers or manufacturers, merchants or laymen, or whatever their profession, should be encouraged not hindered, advanced not retarded. They are entitled to every consideration and deserve well at the hands of the Federal Congress, for the American business man is the bone and muscle of our prosperity and our greatness. I believe in protection at home and abroad.

There have been three main reasons why that trade has not been developed commensurate with the marvelous growth of our industries. They are the lack of banking facilities, the lack of transportation, and the lack of selling facilities—all three of which, working in harmony, are essential to a successful export business. We can not build up that trade by mere declaration of our desire; we can not develop it by idle dreaming or the expression of a wish. We must legislate wisely and without prejudice, giving to our business men the same opportunities enjoyed by their competitors from other lands.

We have taken steps to remedy the deficiency in banking facilities by authorizing the extension of our banking system; we are remedying the lack of shipping facilities by enlarging existing lines and incorporating new ones; and this bill, in my opinion, will, in a large measure, remedy the third defect by placing the American exporter and the European exporter on the same footing.

Now is our opportunity, now the time, to carry the flag into every port of South America. [Applause.] While the nations of Europe are losing by the sword the trade for which they are contending, let us seize our commercial opportunity, the most favorable in a generation, and plant American trade so firmly on the South American Continent that it will endure long after the hostilities in Europe shall have been forgotten. [Applause.] All the American business man wants is an equal chance with his foreign competitor [applause], and an equal chance supported by American enterprise, forwarded by American energy, guided by American genius, means the supremacy of American trade in all the markets of the world. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be again reported.

The amendment was again reported.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division—I withdraw the request.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division.

The committee again divided; and there were—ayes 12, noes 14.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered.

The Committee again divided; and the tellers (Mr. WINGO and Mr. WEBB) reported there were—ayes 26, noes 26.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BAILEY: Page 2, line 9, at the end of the paragraph, insert the following as a new section:

"SEC. 2. That paragraph J of subsection 7 of section 4 of said act be, and the same is hereby, amended by adding the following at the end of said paragraph: 'Provided further, That on and after the 1st day of January, 1917, no tariff taxes shall be collected on importations of the products of any American country which shall admit the products of the United States free of tariff taxes, the President of the United States being hereby authorized and requested to notify all American countries of the passage hereof and to invite their adhesion.'"

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Chairman, this bill is to promote export trade, and I want to submit, on the testimony of our experience with Hawaii, Porto Rico, and the Philippines, that we have found that free trade with those islands has worked marvelously. I believe, and profoundly believe, in expanding the export trade of this country, and the only reason that the export trade of this country is lagging behind development otherwise is because we have chosen to close ourselves within tariff walls, exploiting the American people; and now I want to say that it is proposed under this bill that we shall undertake the exploitation of the people of the rest of the world. I am not sure that that will be the effect of this measure, and I am certainly doubtful of its beneficial effects.

I want to read just a few figures to sustain what I have said about the value of the proposition I here make. I want to call your attention to the fact that in 1898 the total exports from the United States to Porto Rico were $1,404,004, while in 1915 these had risen to $30,929,831. To Hawaii in 1893 the exports were $4,308,188, while in 1915 they had risen to $20,700,000. With respect to the Philippine Islands, in 1904 the total imports from the United States were $4,633,206, while in 1915 they had risen to $22,394,381. And I want to ask any fair-minded man here if, that being the result of free trade with those particular countries, would not free trade with South America, Central America, and the West Indies produce the very same result?

Mr. FORDNEY. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. BAILEY. Yes.

Mr. FORDNEY. What are the exports from those countries?

Mr. BAILEY. I have not time to go into that.

Mr. FORDNEY. You would not give them, if you had.

Mr. BAILEY. I would cheerfully give them if I could be granted further time. You mean imports to the United States?

Mr. FORDNEY. To the United States. You have given the exports from the United States to those countries, and if you will refer to Cuba you will find that our exports last year were $110,000,000 against us, whereas before we adopted Cuban reciprocity they were but $17,000,000.

Mr. BAILEY. Yes.

Mr. FORDNEY. Do you think that is good law?

Mr. BAILEY. Anything that permits——

Mr. FORDNEY. Anything that permits trade from a foreign country here.

Mr. BAILEY. You can not trade one way.

Mr. FORDNEY. Do you want to get cheated in a trade?

Mr. BAILEY. No.

Mr. FORDNEY. But you did.

Mr. BAILEY. If America is anything like your candidate for President says, it is able to take care of itself.

Mr. FORDNEY. That is what your President says.

Mr. BAILEY. I mean that is what your candidate says. Now, these figures show that there was a great increase in the trade from those islands to this country. The export trade from those islands to the United States was increased in like proportion, because, as I said a moment ago, trade is not jug handled. We do not send out goods and get nothing back. We send out goods and get goods back, and the statement made by the lamented McKinley, that the difference was paid in pure gold, was pure moonshine. It is not true, and the statistics say it is not true, and it never was true. I believe if the gentleman will——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman be extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BAILEY. I believe, Mr. Chairman, that the point of order will not properly lie against this amendment. This bill, as I said at the beginning, is aimed to promote exports, and I think I have shown that exports can be best promoted by offering free conditions in trade. And that is what I propose to extend through this amendment. I want to call the attention of the committee to the fact that this proposition is supported by some of the most important manufacturers in this country. A. B. Farquhar, a noted manufacturer in my own State, is an officer of an organization which was formed for the express purpose of promoting the idea which I have embodied in this amendment; and Mr. Ingersoll, of the great Ingersoll Watch Co., is the president of that organization. And many of the vice presidents and other officers of that organization are distinguished men in the manufacturing industry in this country; and I believe, Mr. Chairman, that we could do no better service to the exporters of the United States than to offer them this opportunity, which I believe South America would gladly embrace. I understand that within a very recent date Argentina and Uruguay and one or two other countries have entered into such a union as this proposes. I think, Mr. Chairman, that this amendment should command and ought to receive the support of every man who really wants to promote the exportation of American goods.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I will have to make the point of order. I do not think the amendment is germane. It is a revenue proposition, repealing the tariff law, and while it may directly or indirectly refer to the export trade, it is not germane to the bill or the section to which it is offered.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. HULBERT. I offer an amendment as a new section, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment as a new section, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WINGO. I understand this amendment proposes a new section. Would it not be proper to have the amendments to the section disposed of before offering a new section? I have an amendment to the section. I do not want my right lost.

The CHAIRMAN. Has the gentleman an amendment to perfect the section?

Mr. WINGO. Yes; an amendment to the present section, section 1.

Mr. HULBERT. I understand all amendments to section 1 have been concluded.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment can be reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WINGO: "Page 2, line 5, after the word 'State' insert the the following: 'or in any State or Territory.'"

The CHAIRMAN. All debate on this section has been closed and on all amendments thereto. The Chair has no discretion.

Mr. WINGO. The Chair is mistaken as to the extent of the unanimous-consent request. It went to the paragraph, and not to the section.

The CHAIRMAN. The bill is being considered section by section.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman be allowed to proceed for five minutes.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO] be allowed to offer his amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent is asked that the gentleman from Arkansas may proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, the amendment I offer now is the same as the amendment I offered awhile ago, which was defeated by a tie vote.

I do not yield to any one on the floor or in the House in my desire to do all I can to extend the commerce of the United States.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINGO. Yes.

Mr. WEBB. Will the gentleman state the effect of it? Maybe we can agree to it.

Mr. WINGO. I will do so before I get through. No one on the floor of the House or in the Committee on the Judiciary knows any more about the efforts that have been made to extend our foreign trade than I, because as a member of the Committee on Banking and Currency I know exactly what efforts have been made to extend our foreign commerce. In that capacity I have done all I could as to banking measures to extend our commerce.

The amendment I have offered undertakes to add to the words in the first paragraph, at the top of page 2, these words, "or in any State or Territory." The present language is carefully drawn to exclude that very thing, because the amendment that I offered and which was defeated by a tie vote is an amendment that is opposed by certain people who want to take advantage of the very legitimate demand for an extension of our foreign commerce to break down the antitrust law with reference to trade in agricultural products.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINGO. Yes.

Mr. MANN. I voted for the gentleman's other amendment. I can see no objection to that, but I do see some objection to this. The language of the bill is designed to come within the terms of the commerce clause of the Constitution. The gentleman proposes to add to that a provision in reference to trading wholly within a State. Of course we have no control over such trading.

Mr. WINGO. I think, though, the gentleman will see that I am right, although at first blush the gentleman's contention may appear true. This paragraph goes to defining what you can not do "within the United States." An association, however, can be formed within the city of Philadelphia, for example, and it could enter into a combination for the purpose of trading in the city of Texarkana in cotton for export trade; and unless the amendment I have offered here is adopted, then under the first paragraph of the bill, under the familiar rule which every lawyer will agree with me applies, where you have excluded trading and marketing from the provision in lines 7, 8 and 9, they would by this act be released, and that is what they want. They want to be released from the operations of the present antitrust law.

Mr. MANN. Every monopoly that exists that confines its operations wholly within a State can be controlled only by State law. What control have we over it?

Mr. WINGO. I am speaking of export trade.

Mr. MANN. If so, then that is not within the State.

Mr. WINGO. If they are operating in a State for the purpose of carrying that interstate, to ship to a foreign port, then it would come——

Mr. MANN. That moment it comes within another term.

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman may be right, but I am not sure.

Mr. MANN. I am calling attention to it because I have no desire to participate in passing an unconstitutional act.

Mr. WINGO. Neither have I.

Mr. MANN. I know the gentleman has not. Otherwise I would not have attracted his attention to that point. I think the gentleman is wrong, and I oppose his amendment on that ground. This is only a definition for the purposes of this act. Plainly we have no constitutional authority to control trading within a State. If it is trading from one State to another, we have control. If it is trading to a foreign country, we have.

Mr. WINGO. As a lawyer, of course I agree with the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. No one questions the statement to that extent.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINGO. Yes.

Mr. GARD. Is not the gentleman's purpose covered by the language at the latter part of page 3, line 4?

Mr. WINGO. No. I feel sure that if I could make myself clear, the gentleman would support my amendment. I am sure the gentleman from Ohio would have voted for my amendment. My amendment seeks to do this—and I will restate my proposition for the benefit of the gentleman from Ohio:

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Arkansas has expired.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I ask for five minutes more time. My time was largely taken up by interruptions.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I am very anxious to get this bill passed, and for the sake of expediting the passage of the bill I want to ask unanimous consent to accept the gentleman's first amendment, because that does effect what the gentleman wants done, while the other amendment is doubtful.

Mr. WINGO. Very well. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, that the proceedings by which the first amendment was defeated be vacated. I ask that we revert back to the voting stage on that amendment.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman should ask to vacate the vote by which the amendment was defeated.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas asks unanimous consent to vacate the vote by which his first amendment was rejected. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the first amendment offered by the gentleman from Arkansas.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend, in line 8, by leaving out the word "or," after the word "production," and inserting a comma in place of it.

Mr. WEBB. I accept that, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 1, line 8, by striking out the last word "or"——

Mr. MANN. No; by striking out the word "or" where it first appears after the word "production."

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 1, line 8, by striking out the word "or" where it first appears after the word "production" and insert a comma.

Mr. GARD. The gentleman does not mean that.

Mr. MANN. It would read, "production or manufacture or trading in or marketing in the United States."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

Mr. HULBERT. Mr. Chairman, I already have an amendment at the Clerk's desk. I would like to ask if it is not in order to have it reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Oklahoma offer an amendment to perfect the text of the bill?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Yes; to section 2.

Mr. DILLON. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment to section 1 which I would like to have passed on without further debate.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Dakota offers an amendment to section 1, which the clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. DILLON: Page 1, line 10, after the word "manufacture," strike out the period and insert "nor shall it include any such product unless the same is in the actual possession of some carrier company for exportation purposes."

Mr. WEBB. I hope that will be voted down, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from South Dakota.

The amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will now report the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. HULBERT].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HULBERT: Page 2, line 9, after the word "corporations," insert:

"SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of War, and the Secretary of Commerce be, and they are hereby, directed to report to the Congress on or before the 15th day of December, 1916, as to the advisability of the establishment of free ports within the limits of the established customs districts of the United States as a further aid in the development of the export trade of the United States."

Mr. MANN. I reserve a point of order on that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois reserves a point of order.

Mr. HULBERT. Mr. Chairman, this is not a free-trade proposition; neither is it a matter affecting tariff legislation, except in so far as it is aimed at the methods, without materially changing the financial returns. A free port is a restricted territory within a customs district where foreign goods may be received, discharged, worked upon, manufactured, and reexported, and not pay any duty, obviating the entry of the shipment through the customhouse, as is now the case, unless those goods are brought within the United States. In other words, the object of the establishment of a free port is simply to substitute for the present archaic method of drawbacks a practical, up-to-date business system, so that a merchant will not be required, upon the receipt of a cargo of goods which it is his intention to reexport, in whole or in part, to enter them in the customhouse, secure an appraisal, and make a temporary payment of the fixed duty into the Treasury of the United States, thus depriving him of the use of so much capital until he is able, by the method known as the drawback system, to get it back.

Now, be it noticed, Mr. Chairman, that the amendment which I have offered does not commit this House to the proposition of establishing a free port, but it proposes to have the subject as to the advisability of free ports investigated by the Secretary of the Treasury, because he is the fiscal officer of the Government; by the Secretary of War, because rivers and harbors, where customs zones would be located, are under the jurisdiction of the War Department; and by the Secretary of Commerce, because he has the statistics which will enable the presentation of this matter to this House in an intelligent form. And my amendment contemplates that these matters shall be gathered together between the time of the adoption of this bill, if this amendment be agreed to, as I hope it will be, and the next session of this Congress, so that at that time either I or any other Member of this House, desiring to do so, may introduce legislation seeking to establish the existence of one or more free port zones in this country, and may have the benefit, in the consideration of the question, of all the data which may be collected by the three department heads to whom the matter is referred, and placed before the Congress in a House document.

Mr. Chairman, this matter has received a great deal of attention throughout the country. It is not, as some of you suppose, a new proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HULBERT. I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

Mr. WEBB. I regret very much to be compelled to object. I think the gentleman has placed the matter before the House very clearly.

Mr. HULBERT. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HULBERT. Mr. Chairman, here is a new proposition in legislation so far as this country is concerned, new so far as the House is concerned—because so far as I have been able to find out it has not been introduced here before—but not new so far as the commercial industries of the country are concerned, because I find that the consideration of the matter has received the widest publicity. There have been transmitted to me more than 150 favorable editorials from the press of the country, and I have yet to have brought to my attention a single criticism of the action on the part of commercial bodies who have indorsed this amendment. I introduced it in the form of a resolution, which is now before the Committee on Ways and Means, in order to have this subject investigated in this country.

THE ECONOMIC, INDUSTRIAL, AND COMMERCIAL ASPECTS OF EUROPEAN FREE PORTS, WITH APPLICATIONS FOR NEW YORK.

1. REASONS FOR INTEREST IN THE FREE-PORT QUESTION.

American investigators of European ports and American firms engaged in foreign trade have attracted attention by their favorable comments upon the advantages and conveniences to be found at free ports. Although no systematic investigations have been made of the peculiar merits of the free-port arrangement, we find an investigator of the Chicago Harbor commission saying a few years ago that were Chicago to become a free port she could be the greatest port in the world, a Boston representative advising a free port for Boston, and a delegate from Houston, Tex., who was studying city planning, remarking that in the future he expected Houston to resemble Hamburg.

When it comes to the practical consideration of free ports for the United States, however, the question has reached a point where we must know more definitely what a free port is, whether it has been a success abroad, and whether it can be applied to American conditions.

The first impression one has in reference to the free-port proposition is that of interest because it is peculiarly a German institution. At a time when the United States is looking to the foreign market as the coming outlet for her industry, it is natural that she should turn to German methods, because in 30 or 40 years Germany has developed from an agricultural nation to an industrial and commercial nation of the first rank.

There can be little doubt that Germany has been a pathfinder along a route which we are now traveling. Our change from a predominately agricultural nation to an industrial nation has been easily discerned by those who have been reading the signs of the past 10 years. The census of 1910 tells us that we have declined 18 per cent in the per capita production of cereals since 1900. Argentine beef and corn have been coming into New York Harbor to feed the people who a score of years ago were supplying food to the nations of the Old World. The census of 1910 tells us, on the other hand, that 10 years saw an increase of 77 per cent in the tonnage of our blast furnaces and rolling mills. And during the past year one of our infants, the steel industry, has been contributing an export of nearly a million dollars a day.

To discover what part the institution of free ports in Germany has played in her conquest of foreign markets requires a careful analysis, if we are to ascertain any definite lessons for the United States. In attempting to credit specific advantages to free ports, it is necessary to study the free ports in connection with their competing ports of similar class, which are not free ports. In order to do this, Hamburg and Bremen in Germany, and Copenhagen in Denmark, a free port patterned after the German model, will be contrasted with Antwerp and Rotterdam, their direct competitors, which are not free ports.

2. THE CHARACTER OF EUROPEAN FREE PORTS.

The free port institution is a survival from the days before modern nations arose, when independent cities kept open the routes of traffic. Hamburg and Bremen, now independent, republican states of the German Empire, were members of the Hanseatic League which reached the zenith of its power during the fourteenth century. At a time when the burdens levied upon commerce by petty nobles made commerce precarious, the cities of the Hanseatic League kept their gates open to trade without duties. When Hamburg, Bremen, and Lübuck joined the German Empire in 1871, they retained their status as free cities. They belonged politically to the Empire, but they were outside the German Customs Union. In order to bring these cities into the German customs confederation, Bismarck proposed a plan which gave origin to what we know as free ports. The cities were taken into the customs union, but the harbors were left free.

When Hamburg entered the German Customs Union in 1888, she inaugurated the administration of her free port which for five years previous had been in process of construction. The free port is located on the River Elbe, directly abutting the city, which is 65 miles from the sea, and takes in the entire river for a stretch of 5 miles from Altona to Elbe bridge. The land area comprised within this zone was in 1883 occupied by 16,000 inhabitants, who were evicted when the land was condemned by the State. There is in the free port a land area of 1,325 acres in addition to 1,370 acres of water area, all of which is shut off from the inland by means of a canal on the city side of the harbor and by means of floating palisades on the other sides. The entrances to the city and to the upper and lower Elbe are guarded by customs stations.

Within the free port goods are unloaded, stored, packed, mixed, or manipulated, or manufactured with as great freedom as though customs officials were an unknown species to commerce. There is an interesting way of bringing ships up the river to the free port. The red tape amounts to nothing except that the pilot is a sworn man, who is under oath not to allow any goods to leave the vessel while it is in his charge. There has never been an evidence of bad faith on the part of these pilots.

The Hamburg free port is practically the entire harbor, because, with the exception of river barges en route between the upper and lower Elbe which take the canal around the free port, all the shipping comes to the free port. The free port is a place of varied activity in transshipment from ocean vessels to river barges and the circular railway, in lightering to the city and to the free port warehouses, and in the rapid movements of tugs and small power boats, all centered in a relatively small space. In addition to this activity at the quays and on the water there is an important commercial business being carried on in the rows of warehouses which are employed not only for storage but also for selling headquarters and offices, and close by are two great shipbuilding plants, and just beyond rows of small factories which front directly on the water. Whoever has seen the harbor of Hamburg has seen one of the most impressive sights of a great commercial nation.

The general character of the free port in Hamburg has been copied by the other German ports, except in respect to manufacture, which is a privilege restricted to Hamburg. Bremen, for instance, has the warehousing and transshipment features, with entire freedom in the way of packing, mixing, or manipulating, but her frequent petitions to the Empire for the right to manufacture have been unavailing. Since Bremen embraced Bismarck's proposel three years later than Hamburg, she has had to suffer for her scepticism by this limitation.

Bremen, which is on the River Weser, 46 miles from the sea, located her free port just down the river from her old docks. A large inland basin was excavated from the dry land and connected directly with the river; this was surrounded by quays, transshipment sheds, warehouses, and circular railway, and isolated from the inland by means of a fence. Bremen's shipping quickly transferred itself to the free port, and the old warehouses and quays abutting the city have fallen into decay. In order to accommodate the growing traffic of the free port it later became necessary to add a second inland basin adjoining the first.

Copenhagen, Denmark, the Queen of the North and the commercial center of the Scandinavian countries, had watched with interest the installation of free ports in Germany, and her Parliament decided in 1891 that the best way to meet German competition in the Baltic was to copy the German free port. There is one decided difference, however, to be noted in the free port of Copenhagen, which is that the old harbor was left unaltered and the free port was planned as only one unit in the whole harbor. The land for the free port was reclaimed from the sea, as the site selected was seaward from the old harbor, so much so that a breakwater had to be constructed. The land area, only 148 acres, consists partly of projecting arms, on which are located over 4,000 yards of quays and the warehouses, and an outer fringe of ground on the city side, utilized for administration buildings, freight yards, and factories.

The Austrian ports of Trieste and Fiume have the free-port arrangement, as have several Italian ports in limited form. Because Hamburg, Bremen, and Copenhagen are the best examples of European free ports, this study has been confined to them, and the minor German free ports, as well as the Austrian and Italian experiences, have been left until a more extensive report may be called for.

There is another class of free ports, which may be termed colonial free ports. The German and English ports in the Far East are of this nature, as is another English port nearer home—those of Gibraltar. But as the arguments for colonial free ports may be somewhat different from those which apply to the ports of commercial nations, it is proper for us to limit our tests in behalf of New York to the free ports of northwest Europe.

3. EUROPEAN COMPETITION WHICH CONFRONTS FREE PORTS.

These northwest European free ports compete with Rotterdam, Antwerp, and to a less degree with French and English ports. England is a free-trade nation, and her ports have been largely free, due to the absence of tariffs. France deals in specialities and luxuries, and does not feel the pinch of handling costs as acutely as do nations dealing in more or less bulky staples. The real test, however, which must be applied to Hamburg, Bremen, and Copenhagen is as to how they get along as compared to Antwerp and Rotterdam, ports which are bidding for trade in part of the same territory. If the free-port arrangement is of commercial merit, these latter ports would not overlook it, unless conditions were radically different with them than in the free ports. The conditions are different because of the scale of tariffs. Belgium and Holland are semifree-trade countries.

In a country where few goods are dutiable, a free port would provide special facilities for only a scant amount of traffic. The problem is very different in Germany, where there is a high scale of tariffs very similar to our own, from what it is in the semifree-trade countries of Belgium and Holland. Officials and members of the chambers of commerce in Antwerp and Rotterdam said that they considered free ports necessary in high-tariff countries like Germany and the United States, but that their duties were too low to justify the creation of free ports. In order to prove up this excuse of low duties let us consider the tariffs of these countries.

When we examine the duties in Belgium we find that raw materials are mostly free. The extent of imports which enter free of duty is illustrated by the Belgium imports from the United States for the year ending January 1, 1912; of these imports only 9.6 per cent on the basis of tonnage, and 16.7 per cent on the basis of value were dutiable. Again, the insignificance of tariff duties in Belgium is shown by the amount of revenue collected. The customs duties collected for the year 1912 totaled but 74,460,572 francs; and, further, of these duties collected by Belgium only 17.4 per cent came from duties levied upon goods stored in bonded warehouses.

Antwerp's importance in transit trade comes mainly from the fact that her port is located on direct routes of shipment to a large territory. The bulk of her transit trade, which is centrally distributed from a European point, is broken in lots in England and shipped through Antwerp in bond. This is clearly illustrated by the transit statistics. The volume of the Belgium transit trade, which goes largely via Antwerp, was for the year 1912, 2,437,290,000 francs. The proportion which stopped in bonded warehouses was as follows:

	Quantity.	Value.
	Tons.	Francs.
Transit direct	6,513,404	2,405,405,000
Transit via bonded warehouses	78,384	31,890,000

That is, there was only about $6,000,000 worth of transit goods stored in the bonded warehouses of Belgium in 1912. If we estimate two-thirds of this as being stored in Antwerp—a rough estimate—Antwerp has only about $4,000,000 a year of this kind of traffic to handle. This is too small an amount to justify a free port.

The importance of staples in the commerce of Rotterdam is shown by the fact that out of the total import for the year 1910 of 17,859,027 tons of 1,000 kilos, 2,250 pounds, ore consisted of 6,236,909 tons, grain of 4,127,769 tons, wood of 1,514,248 tons, coal of 1,448,113 tons. Other important items, smaller in extent, were Brazilian coffee, of which 67,000 tons was imported, and products such as artificial butter, margerine, oils, etc., which totaled an import of 302,000 tons.

These major articles of commerce are duty free. In addition, other important items of trade, such as machinery propelled by steam and materials for shipbuilding are free. Rotterdam is an important transit point in the tobacco trade. The duty on raw tobacco is, however, only 70 Dutch cents per 100 kilos. This reduces it to $1.12 duty for 900 pounds of raw tobacco. This duty is so insignificant in respect to value that tobacco manufacturers do not bother to collect drawbacks upon reexport.

Holland, since she levies excise duties on sugar and alcohol, has a drawback system for reexports in sugar-containing articles, such as jams, condensed milk, chocolate and confectionery, and for alcohol in liqueurs and perfumes. The latest statistics available for 1911 were specially provided by the collector of the port of Rotterdam, and show a drawback paid for sugar of $1,583,656, and for alcohol $201,188 in liqueurs and $39,340 in perfumes.

The statistics have been given only for the bonded warehouse business for Belgium and the drawbacks for Holland, because it was not possible to secure both sets of statistics for each country. It is not likely, however, that there is any material difference between the countries in the amount of bonded warehouse business and drawbacks. Upon the small proportion of dutiable traffic Belgium levies a 10 per cent ad valorem tariff and Holland levies a 5 per cent ad valorem tariff. The large percentage of goods duty free, the low tariffs, the small bonded warehouse business, and the inconsiderable drawbacks explain why these countries feel that they have a need for a free port too limited to pay for an expensive equipment.

4. THE IMPORTANCE OF TRANSSHIPMENT DRAWBACKS AND BONDED WAREHOUSES AT THE PORT OF NEW YORK.

After explaining why Antwerp and Rotterdam are not free ports, the question arises as to whether New York has enough dutiable traffic to justify the consideration of a free port. In the first place, New York has an important transshipment traffic—that is, through shipment in bond to other countries. Transshipment statistics, which are separately recorded by the Bureau of Navigation and Commerce, show that for the year ending June 30, 1912, a total of $181,000,000 transshipment goods passed through our territory, of which $60,000,000 went through the port of New York. Had New York a free port, it is likely that part of this traffic would have stopped, as the experience of free ports shows that one of their greatest services is that of becoming a base for transshipment.

The United States paid in drawbacks for the reexport of foreign materials, for the fiscal year 1912, $4,525,570.13, of which $2,784,561.01 was recorded at the port of New York. Although we are not at present utilizing dutiable foreign materials extensively in our articles of export, it is likely that this will increase when we enter the foreign markets more largely with manufactures. The drawback law allows a return of 99 per cent of the duties upon the reexport of foreign materials, with additional fees which in the instance of a large shipment amount to about 1 per cent, and in the case of small shipments to more.

New York has been accustomed to do about 60 per cent of all the bonded warehousing in the United States. On the day of June 30, 1912, the Government statistics showed goods in the bonded warehouses of New York valued at $45,218,560. The fiscal year of 1913 showed an increase in bonded warehousing of about 25 per cent. The high-water mark for New York occurred in the month of September, 1913, just before the new tariff went into effect, when the customhouse for this district recorded goods stored on the last day of that month valued at $69,659,447.

Goods released from bonded warehouses in the New York customs district, for the fiscal year 1913, totaled $90,000,000. This bulks imposingly when contrasted with the sum of about $4,000,000 released from the bonded warehouses of Antwerp in a year.

The present law in reference to bonded warehouses provides only for such charges as are necessary for administration. Every bonded warehouse must pay at least one customs official, and the larger two or more, at the rate of $1,600 a year, to supervise the incoming and outgoing of merchandise. In addition, certain fees are charged to compensate the general customs administration.

In addition to avoiding these charges, warehouses in a free port should offer great advantages in superior location for transportation, advantages in the cheap handling of traffic, and, most important, the advantage of control of merchandise.

The owners of bonded warehouses in Bremen opposed the free-port project for fear of the loss of their business, but the vice president of the Bremen Chamber of Commerce testified that, as it had worked out, these men had not suffered particularly, because the growing traffic of the port had taken care of them as well as bringing success to the free-port warehouses. In New York it is essentially a question of more isolated private bonded warehouses or free-port warehouses to accommodate growing traffic.

What effect the new tariff will have upon the volume of dutiable imports is difficult to say, because several important items went on the free list; most of the ratings changed, however, were in the way of reductions, while 307 ratings remained unchanged and 86 were increased. The fiscal year 1913 showed that 46.53 per cent of our imports were dutiable. Even if the percentage of our dutiable imports is decreased it is unlikely that the volume of dutiable imports will decrease absolutely, on account of our growing trade. With duties stationary for several years the bonded-warehouse business has grown steadily, a tendency which should continue, because lower tariffs will increase imports.

It is important to consider the amount of dutiable merchandise entering a port with the volume of drawbacks and bonded-warehouse business, because it is this kind of traffic which lays the foundation for the success of a free port. New York is preeminently the American port which is best fitted in this respect to consider a free port. When a free port is established European experience shows us free merchandise seeks it as well because of the special facilities offered. At Antwerp, Rotterdam, Hamburg, Bremen, Copenhagen, and Berlin men engaged in foreign trade said, on the basis of their knowledge of the situation at New York, which is considerable, that New York is a logical place for a free port.

5. THE ADMINISTRATION OF FREE PORTS.

If New York is a logical place for a free port from the standpoint of duties, it is of interest to us to inquire into the management, the special services, and the general success of European free ports.

The capital investment in the three major free ports of Hamburg, Bremen, and Copenhagen has been provided partly by the State and partly by private enterprise. In each instance the State paid for the land, dredged the harbors, and built the quays, while private companies, called free-port warehousing companies, paid for the warehouses, railway tracks, cranes, and their administration buildings.

The harbor administration in Hamburg and Bremen is controlled by the State through harbor and engineering departments. In Copenhagen the harbor administration is undertaken by the department of the interior of Denmark, which controls the entire harbor, of which the free port is a part. At all these ports the harbor departments assign berths to ships, collect the harbor dues, and generally administer the shipping.

The warehouse companies, who administer their own property, share their profits with the State to reimburse the State for its investment in the land and harbor. In Hamburg the directorate of the Free Port Warehouse Co. includes one representative of the German Empire and several representatives of the State of Hamburg.

The financial results at these free ports have been satisfactory both to the State and to the companies. The State of Hamburg has made upon its investment 3.5 per cent from 1889 to 1906, 5.5 per cent from 1906 to 1909, and since then somewhat more; the shares of the company paid 5 per cent dividend from 1889 to 1905, 5.5 per cent from 1906 to 1908, and they are now receiving 6 per cent. These disbursements have been obtained in spite of liberal writing off against depreciation, renewals, pensions, and so on. At Bremen and Copenhagen the same method of financing has been employed as at Hamburg, and the results have also been satisfactory. In order to see the way in which the receipts are expended and the method of dividing the net profits, statements are appended from the last report of the Hamburg Free Port Warehouse Co. The item "State purchasing fund" is explained by the fact that the State is utilizing part of its profits to amortize the shares of the private company, so that the State will ultimately be the owner of the entire equipment.

Aside from the land and water front occupied by the Free Port Warehouse Co., Hamburg has leased land area and quays to manufacturing companies and steamship lines. These leases have been for long terms and have been profitable to the lessees; subleases have been negotiated at as high as six times the rate in the original lease.

In Copenhagen the Free Port Warehouse Co. has control of all the industrial business of the free port and makes leases to the manufacturing companies. The value of these leases has increased.

6. THE FREE PORT AS A TERMINAL QUESTION AT NEW YORK.

The first question which one should answer in considering the proposal of a free port for New York is as to whether it is feasible from a terminal standpoint. That is, is it a practical matter? The salient character of free ports, their unity and coordination, may seem impracticable in a harbor with such a long and broken water front as we find here. It would be impracticable, doubtless, to attempt to make the whole of New York Harbor into a free port. The administrative difficulties facing the customs in such a case would make an impossible task; and as the harbor has been developed with no idea of a free port, clean-cut correlation would be outside of the question.

No such objections, however, stand in the way of a separate free-port zone in New York Harbor. Were an unoccupied area selected, it would be possible to construct a terminal all at once and abreast the latest models. Such a scheme has much to commend it. New York needs to provide accommodations for growing traffic, and she is now suffering from the lack of unified and specialized terminals. The freight-congestion problem which has arisen in Manhattan, a solution of which seems so difficult, should hasten the consideration of a special zone for our transit foreign trade.

Well-planned and coordinated transportation, warehousing, and manufacturing facilities, are familiar to New York in the instance of the Bush Terminal. Such facilities appeal strongly to traffic which requires a center from which distribution can be quickly accomplished, and especially to such traffic as is in small units. Large-scale facilities for many comparatively small businesses is most needed by such firms as would use a free port.

A large-scale terminal for transit, special export and domestic imports has a double recommendation for New York. It would relieve the congestion in Manhattan and would give better accommodations to a kind of business which is faced with acute international competition. Lighterage to a free port outside the expensive land area would furnish no additional expense; a switching terminal railway could secure a division of rate similar to the Bush Terminal Railway and support itself; private companies would see an opening for a profitable warehousing business; and the city of New York, which is trying to relieve the car-float congestion at the piers in lower Manhattan, could find a relief by making appropriations for the expense of the free port land and wharves.

A free port would not lay an extra burden on the customs regulation of the port of New York. It seems from foreign experience that there is no question about the success of guarding an isolated free port zone. In New York it would merely divert labor from the administration of bonded warehouses and drawbacks to stretching a guard around the free port.

7. DISCHARGING SHIP'S CARGO IS QUICKLY DONE AT FREE PORTS.

Of the special advantages to trade offered by a free port, the first is that already mentioned of freedom from the red tape and expense connected with drawbacks and bonded warehouses. A second advantage is that when a ship ties up in a free port it is possible to unload the cargo without any customs inspection. Representatives of steamship lines say that this is a great luxury for them, as it enables them to have quicker and better control over their ships. In these days of large investment in ships, saving in time means more voyages and larger interest returns.

The quickness with which cargo may be discharged is also of advantage to consignees. It is an advantage in getting goods inland, because it relieves congestion and gives a steady stream of goods which may be inspected as part of the routine. In the case of transit goods it is pure gain.

The time element in handling cargo is becoming more and more important. The great foe of speedy service is congestion, and the ease with which goods may be received into a free port is everywhere highly appreciated.

8. A FREE PORT GIVES CONTROL OVER MERCHANDISE.

It is an advantage to be rid of customs fees, and it is an advantage to have goods come in quickly, but it is an even greater advantage to have control of your own goods. The free ports are used in many instances for assembling parts prior to direct shipment. One American firm in the Hamburg free port puts Elgin watch movements into Keystone cases, packs shipments, and sticks firm labels on the packages, all in a room in one of the free port warehouses. Another firm, next door, brings in Panama hats and fits them out with hatbands. A merchant has a show room, his sales headquarters, his assembling room, and his shipping department all in one. The variety of uses of the free port for this kind of thing is easily imaginable.

The importance of this control over the goods is better realized when we discover that most of the firms in a free port do both an import business to the inland and a transit trade with other countries. Some firms do 90 per cent in domestic imports and the balance in transit, while with other firms the ratios are reversed. The ratio does not seem to be of vital significance, since we find that it varies so widely. The important thing is that a merchant does not know what proportion of his goods are for transit in advance. If he does this mixed business, he is in position to take advantage of the best market when he is in the free port. He does not run a risk of bringing goods to a certain place and then finding that he has overshot the demand. He is, therefore, safe in establishing a base where goods may be brought in in bulk, mixed with other goods, and prepared for shipment.

The control which a merchant has over his goods is the first thing to attract attention in a free port. The satisfaction which such a man feels in having free access to his goods is akin to the comfortable, homelike feeling we associate with owning one's own home. The man who employs bonded warehouses for entering the home market or for transit shipment is a homeless man. This may be bad enough for a local firm, but it is positively depressing to a foreign house. We find in Hamburg a large number of American firms who employ the free port as a base for their European trade. There is nothing like this at Antwerp or Rotterdam. And the free port itself is a big argument in inducing American firms to distribute from Hamburg.

9. AMOUNT OF TRANSIT TRAFFIC AT FREE PORTS.

The great thing about free ports is that they are the favorite location for a base of operations. The directors of the Free Port Warehouse Co. in Copenhagen furnished statistics which show that about 30 per cent of the tonnage of their free port is in transit traffic. Since the tonnage of the free port of Copenhagen increased 100 per cent in the 10 years ending 1910, at the same time that the old harbor was increasing only 4 per cent, it is evident that the peculiar advantage of the free port is appreciated.

In the instance of Bremen, statistics given in a report on the harbor of Bremen by a State harbor commission in 1907 show that the increased tonnage handled in the free port from the time of the beginning in 1889 to 1904 was fivefold. These figures are for the tonnage lifted by cranes, which includes practically all the goods unloaded. The statistics kept at Bremen show the amount of transit in her commerce. The latest available statistics follow:

At Hamburg the warehousing business has shown a steady increase from year to year, which has necessitated the building of new warehouses at frequent intervals. The Free Port Warehouse Co. leases floors or parts of floors by the year, and in addition does a package warehouse business at fixed tariffs for various commodities. The figures of the receipts from these sources constitute a good index of the increase of this business:

Statistics for transit are not kept at Hamburg, so it is impossible to find out the proportion of this kind of traffic in her total commerce except by examining the amount of goods exported from Hamburg which are not produced in Germany. This involves a detailed statistical study which would be too long to introduce here. The influence of transit trade, however, has been important. It is not possible, in addition, to tabulate the various activities in the free port in a systematic manner, because the sentiment about the port being "free" has worked against the gathering of any such information. It is possible, however, to indicate the nature of the business done there by means of citing typical examples. The great variety of the business represented in the Free Port Warehouse Co.'s buildings can be imagined when we realize that the floor space of these buildings is more than 5,000,000 square feet. The material gained in this investigation was by means of personal interview and by means of a circular letter sent out to 55 representative firms using the free port, selected by Mr. E. H. Mommenhoff, American vice consul general at Hamburg. Various activities may be illustrated by referring to concrete instances, which are typical.

10. EXAMPLE OF PURE TRANSIT TRADE AT HAMBURG FREE PORT.

Pure transit trade is an exception, as most of the firms do a mixed transit and domestic import business. A rare situation may arise which makes a free port the location for pure transit trade. Such an instance is seen in Hamburg in the case of Mr. Eugen Guttmann, whose letter may be read with interest:

DEAR SIR: In reply to your favor of the 2d instant, I have much pleasure in giving you the following information:

The principal articles I handle are crude and rectified spirit (alcohol) of foreign origin, which only can be used for export purposes, as the entry duty is so high that it can not compete with the spirit produced in Germany. So you will understand that the free port is of special importance for my trade. Most of my German buyers have their manufactories in the free port, as their products are only destined for the export, and so they have no difficulty whatever in working up the foreign spirit, the cost of which is much lower than the spirit of German origin. There are also some firms in the nonfree port with the allowance to use for their export production foreign spirit, but only under customs supervision, which, of course, is more expensive and combined with more or less trouble.

Further on the free port is of great importance for the transit business. Last year I did a big business with the alcohol monopoly in Switzerland. The spirit received here from Russia or other countries by steamers was landed here in the free port and filled into my tank cars, which, after having been leaded by the customs, could be forwarded without any other circumstances.

In my opinion, the free port in Hamburg is of a very great value for the whole trade, and has contributed considerably to the development of the commerce in our city and of the industrial works.

I leave it to you to make any use of this communication you wish, and in case you should require further particulars whatever, I am willingly at your service.

I am, dear sir,

Yours, very respectfully, EUGEN GUTTMANN.

11. EXAMPLES OF MIXED TRANSIT AND DOMESTIC IMPORT AT HAMBURG.

1. The Ceres Packing Co., of California, which has warehouse room leased from the Free Port Warehouse Co., deals in dried fruits and spices, on which the German duty is from $1 to $15 per 225 pounds. The only manipulation is dipping the fruit. Their trade is partly German import and partly transshipment to other countries. Their Hamburg agent says that the free port is very valuable to them.

2. The large firm of Johs. Schröder, which does a general import and export business, sent a letter which is of interest, because it puts the matter up to New York:

In reply I beg to state that though I am primarily doing a transshipment and export business, our free port offers also a good deal of advantages to me, especially as to the provisional warehousing of all incoming goods free of duty, partly destined for the later import both into the German Empire and into other European countries, f. i., Sweden, Norway, and Russia.

On the other hand, as a prominent exporter both of raw material, such as glue stock, wood meal, etc., and of various kinds of spirits (cherry juice, etc.) to the States, I should consider it not only an advantage but even a direct necessity for New York to finally offer adequate advantages to the German shippers, as our port is offering to exporters of the other side of the ocean.

If desired, I should be readily willing to furnish you with any additional information on the subject.

Very respectfully, yours,

JOHS. SCHRÖDER.
C. BAHL.

3. F. A. Sohst, a lumber dealer who handles sawed and hewed lumber from all parts of the world, has a model equipment in the free port, consisting of a dockyard, with canal and railway connections, electric crane, and covered storage sheds. The German duty on lumber runs from about $0.20 to $2.50 per cubic meter. The bulk of his business is import to Germany, although he does some transit trade with foreign countries and colonies. His opinion about the free port is summed up as follows: "Practically the whole importance and welfare of Hamburg's trade depends upon the free port."

4. Julius Grossman, who rents several floors from the Warehouse Co., imports and exports drugs, spices, chemical, and essential oils; crude drugs for medical purposes are usually free, but there is a heavy duty on spices and essential oils. The goods are repacked, cleaned, worked, and stored. They are sold to the German market or to foreign countries, according to trade conditions. Mr. Grossman says:

The free port in Hamburg is certainly of great benefit to Hamburg trade.

5. Ph. Astheimer & Sohn, dealers in foreign fruit on which duties range from $0.75 to $2.50 per 225 pounds, sell about 90 per cent of their goods to the German market and reexport 10 per cent to other countries. Their opinion about the free port is: "Greatest thing on earth."

6. Deutsche Amerikanische Petroleum Gesellschaft, the German branch of the Standard Oil Co., has large storage tanks and storage sheds in the free port, where they handle naphtha, oils, gas oils, and lubricating oils. The duties, which vary somewhat, average about $1.50 per 225 pounds. The company fills oil into their tanks from steamers and on shipping out fill tank barges and tank railway cars. They fill iron and wooden barrels as well. Most of the goods are for the German market, but they have some transshipment. The opinion of the company is expressed by their agent, Mr. H. Riedmann, as follows:

We consider that the free port offers great advantages, as it facilitates commerce enormously; for instance, it does away with control of customs during storage.

7. Of all the personal interviews and letters, there was but one which was not favorable to the free port. A man importing goods which come into Germany free said that he was conducting his business in the free port for no special reason. It was a matter of indifference to him.

These instances are representative of the sort of business found in the Hamburg free port, but almost every conceivable variety of trade is there. The general sentiment of the firms using the free port is more than approval—it is enthusiastic. It is only by considerable acquaintance with the facilities of free ports and the advantages they offer in control over merchandise that the uninitiated can realize that a free port is not a theory, but an institution which has proven itself to be a practical success.

Let one go from Hamburg, Bremen, or Copenhagen to Antwerp and Rotterdam, and he will ask where are the merchants who are using the harbor as a base for distribution? If they are handling nondutiable merchandise they may be found scattered all around the port. If they are handling dutiable merchandise they have no home of their own such as is found in free ports. At Antwerp the Hudson Motor Car Co. asked for the privilege of setting up their machines in the royal bonded warehouses and using the place for a sales headquarters. This was something, they were told, which could not be done in the bonded warehouses. An American shoe firm also tried to make Antwerp a sales headquarters, but went away because of the bonded warehouse regulations.

If New York wishes to become a base for distribution, which combines import and transit, she can not make a very convincing appeal with her bonded warehouses to the foreigner who knows the advantages of free ports. The competition among ports for foreign commerce often turns upon a small advantage, as is witnessed by the struggle over the import and export railway freight differentials at Atlantic ports of the United States. A free port is a pretty substantial sort of differential.

12. MANUFACTURING IN THE FREE PORT OF HAMBURG.

Hamburg and Copenhagen are the two free ports which have the privilege of manufacture. At both of these ports this is a much-valued adjunct. The manufacturing industries in the free port of Hamburg consist of shipbuilding companies, allied industries such as iron foundries and boiler works, and industries engaged in working up raw materials which enter partly into transit trade such as alcohol, chemicals, and oil products. In addition there are some establishments which make ship biscuits and other articles for sale to the lines which center in the free port. All the manufacturing industries are engaged in lines pertaining to shipping or ship supplies or to articles entering into transit traffic.

The great manufacturing industry of the free port is shipbuilding. Where a decade ago Germany was buying ships made in English yards, to-day the Vulcan in Hamburg has built the Imperator and Blohm & Voss is building the new 58,000-ton Vaterland, which is to have speed as well as size. These two great companies and a number of smaller ones engaged in ship repairing and shipbuilding now employ as high as 10,000 workmen.

The number of workmen engaged in the other industries will vary from 3,000 to 5,000. In order to give suitable transportation to this large number of workmen who must enter and leave the free port daily, Hamburg has constructed the Elbe Tunnel, which connects the mainland with the plants located on land out in the stream.

Dr. E. J. Clapp, in his book on Port of Hamburg, says that extensive manufacturing has not grown up in the free port. The reason for this, which he does not explain, is not because the free port of Hamburg is an undesirable place for manufacturing. The reason why manufacturing has not grown more rapidly in the free port is due to the simple reason that the land for this purpose has been limited. A proof of the growth which might come in the free port, were land area available, is well shown by the situation which arose when Hamburg recently considered the proposition of adding a new section to the free port for manufacturing. This section, "Entret," it was decided should not be added, because it does not directly join the free port. The possible difficulties in administering a separate zone was what led to the failure of the project. The interesting thing, however, is that when this additional zone was being considered between 100 and 200 applications came in to the harbor department for the leasing of space. The authority for this statement is Overharbormaster Capt. Langkopf. He said, moreover, that the value of leases in the manufacturing section of the free port, when subleases occur, is now about six times that fixed in the original leases. This should warn New York City that an important matter in connection with the layout of a free port is an arrangement which makes possible the addition of more land area for manufacturing as trade develops.

13. MANUFACTURING IN THE FREE PORT OF COPENHAGEN.

The character and extent of manufacturing in the free port of Copenhagen is well shown by the following list of industries, with the number of workers employed in each. This information was collected March 8, 1913, by United States Consul General Edward D. Winslow, of Copenhagen:

Industry:	Number of employees.
1. Marble works	22
2. Harness	5
3. Dyehouses	9
4. Feed mills	17
5. Gilding plant	14
6. Oil preparations	1
7. Smithies	15
8. Joiners	2
9. Coopers	8
10. Feather works	95
11. Furs	34
12. Coffee roasters	37
13. Chocolate factory	44
14. Moving-picture films	69
15. Smoked fish	3
16. Sugar factory	2
17. Arms factory	121
18. Casein	2
19. Liquors	2
Total 19 establishments	502

This list includes only firms which alter the character of merchandise. Setting up machinery, mixing, sorting, and so forth, are not included. By inquiry it developed that the success of these particular industries depends upon the free port. The business is in addition to what Copenhagen would otherwise have. Although the importance of these industries may not be great for a large country, it is of considerable importance to a country with such a small manufacturing industry as Denmark. Relatively it is significant.

14. THE CASE AT NEW YORK FOR MANUFACTURING IN A FREE PORT.

Although the immediate need of a free port in New York Harbor is as a base for transit and domestic imports, the possible manufacturing claim should not be ignored. Some manufacturers are using foreign materials and at the same time sending part of their product out as export. The drawback figures show that there is a fairly large volume of this trade.

In such cases, where a special factory could be established to care particularly for the foreign export, there would be a great advantage in locating a plant in the free port.

The free port should be an economical place to manufacture, because New York has capital, a large supply of skilled and cheap labor, and relatively cheap coal. The land in the free port could also be leased at reasonable figures, as the location would not be in the region of high land values.

There is also an argument for the location of factories in the free port which do not use, to any extent, imported materials. Special export factories for staple American products could be very well established. Many a good foreign market for American goods has been spoiled due to carelessness in delivering orders promptly, or due to failure to cater to the foreign taste. American consuls and business men in Europe tell of many instances of this kind. The American Association of Commerce and Trade of Berlin, is trying to bring to the attention of American firms the fact that business must be conducted in reference to certain markets if success is expected. Any American export which requires salesmanship to market, it is commonly agreed, should have the attention of an export department, with a continuous policy which aims to keep and develop a market. Branch factories for export would be an advance step, because one could manufacture in such a way as to best take advantage of foreign whim of style and price, and such a factory located in the free port would be in a center of foreign-trade knowledge and at the crossing of the ways for transportation.

15. MANUFACTURING IN FREE PORTS HAS NOT BEEN OPPOSED BY INLAND MANUFACTURERS.

A special effort was made to discover any opposition to manufacturing in the free ports of Hamburg and Copenhagen which might exist on the part of inland manufacturers. It was something of a surprise to find that no such opposition existed. Burgomeister Max Prodoehl, of Hamburg, said that very little friction existed between the free port and the outside, and that this was very easily adjusted. The president of the Hamburg Chamber of Commerce, Mr. Bohlen, said that he knew of no opposition to manufacturing in the free port. If opposition were to be found, it would naturally be looked for in Prussia, a great inland manufacturing State. A visit was made to Berlin primarily to inquire into this question. Dr. Lehman, the Prussian secretary of foreign affairs, who knows the relations between Prussia and the other German States, said very frankly that he had never heard of any opposition on the part of Prussian manufacturers to the manufacturing in the Hamburg free port.

The absence of opposition from inland manufacturers was also found at Copenhagen. It seems to be felt that it is natural for certain kinds of manufacturing to be in the free port. The harbor master at Copenhagen and directors of the Free Port Warehouse Co. said that they knew of no inland opposition.

16. TRANSIT TRAFFIC AT A FREE PORT IMPROVES SHIPPING CONNECTIONS.

It is generally recognized that adequate sea routes are as important to a port as proper railway connections. There is no royal road to good shipping connections, except in providing the traffic. Some European nations try to develop their shipping by means of subsidies, but this is like a protective tariff in that it is only justified if it can put the business ultimately upon its feet. But the overwhelming bulk of the traffic at the ports of northwest Europe is handled by ship lines to whom a subsidy, if they receive any, is little more than an incident.

As a great deal of publicity has been given lately to the pooling arrangements among the lines on the North Atlantic, it may be surmised that shipping is losing its competitive character. We wonder if the mere weight and power of a great steamship line does not arbitrarily determine whence traffic shall go? These pools are, however, similar to the pools which were common in the United States prior to the passage of the Sherman Act, in that they are frequently adjusted and on the basis of competitive power. The freight pool on the North Atlantic is adjusted every year. The freight agent of one of the large lines in the pool said that no arrangement is possible which ignores traffic conditions.

A free port makes more particularly for shipping connections outside the great routes of traffic. If shipments are broken and redistributed in transit, there is an additional reason for regular shipping routes to the territory in this zone. There can be no doubt that Copenhagen has here an overwhelming advantage over the other Scandinavian ports. Hamburg, as well, has an advantage over her competitors, Antwerp and Rotterdam, in the variety of her adjacent shipping connections. The traffic induced by the free port is an important reason for this.

New York is just at present facing a rearrangement of shipping routes, due to the opening of the Panama Canal. It is something of a shock to find the interest which foreign ports and traders are taking in this event. They realize the advantage of getting into the markets first and establishing themselves. These ports are not desirous of seeing New York a place where shipments are broken in bulk and redistributed; they wish to have direct connections themselves. A large steamship agent in Berlin—Mr. Al Peters, an American—says that New York should wake up, because the foreigners are taking themselves seriously in a way which New York is not. New York is the logical point for distribution to North and South America, he says, but if snappy competition can do it the European ports are going to get this traffic from under our noses.

We have had a great deal of interest in the building of the Panama Canal, but it is time that we should begin to get American traffic lined up to utilize it. If American steamship lines and American merchants are to avail themselves of the direct routes to the west coast of South America and the Far East, they should be interested in the way in which a free port can bring traffic which will make such routes profitable. If the free port can get the transit trade coming through New York it will be of advantage to every inland shipper who uses these markets because it will help him to better steamship connections.

But the profit of the free port in shipping connections will be broader than this; it will benefit all routes. As the traveling man has enabled many a hotel to keep open to the benefit of local guests, so transit traffic may be the regular and additional element which will keep open many an ocean route. For even though foreign merchants and steamship lines favor their home ports, they will not neglect going the way where the most cash profit is to be made. If we provide the traffic, or offer it inducements, we have a lever for agitating for better ocean connections.

17. A FREE PORT GIVES SPECIAL ADVANTAGES TO SHIPPING.

In addition to the service of providing more transit traffic, a free port will appeal to shipping by offering opportunities for quick transfer of cargo, cheap wharfage, and facilities for coaling and repairing ships. It is generally agreed by men engaged in foreign trade that New York should very seriously consider the problem of making New York a profitable place for ships to do business.

There is one point which can not be too clearly emphasized, and that is the undoubted fact that our city would materially benefit by a free port in so far as the creation of shipping facilities for our rapidly increasing oversea business. The verification of this statement at Hamburg, Bremen, and other ports in Europe has been so clearly shown that there is no question but that we would equally derive advantage. A free port with facilities for rapid discharge of cargo, storage of goods for transshipment, opportunities to repair vessels in distress quickly and cheaply, with small port charges and wharfage, unquestionably attracts the shipping of the world to that port, and not only does it bring the tramp steamer, but it leads to the building up of permanent and regular lines to various prominent shipping ports in other parts of the world, thus affording the merchants and manufacturers of a country more advantages and larger opportunities to promptly send forward their products to the advantage undoubtedly of the national trade and prosperity.

In the investigation of the European ports, information was secured as to the number and destination of the sailings from the different ports, the facilities offered in the way of ship repairing, the harbor and wharfage charges, and the convenience of bringing in ships. In the hearings on the free port question it may be possible to go into detail as to the relative opportunities offered by New York. The vice president of the Bremen Chamber of Commerce, Mr. Lohman, who has represented the North German Lloyd Steamship Co. in New York and Australia and who is now a large foreign trader, said in an interview that there was no question whatever that a free port offered substantial advantages to shipping. The Hamburg agent of the Hansa Line, which enters all the ports studied, also said in an interview that Hamburg offered the best facilities for ship repairing and for bringing in ships of any port on the Continent of Europe.

18. HAMBURG'S SUPERIOR SHIPPING CONNECTIONS CAN NOT BE EXPLAINED BY LOWER HARBOR DUES OR LOWER RATES FOR TRANSPORTATION.

The apparent preeminence of Hamburg among the ports of the northwest Atlantic, which is generally agreed to, it may be suggested, may result from lower harbor dues and lower transportation rates. Such an inference is not borne out by the facts.

A bill was introduced into the lower house of the Hamburg Legislature during the past year which provided for an increase in the harbor dues. It failed to pass because it was clearly brought out in the debate on the bill that Hamburg already had higher port expenses than her competing ports.

In the records of the proceedings we find statistics which show that the bringing in of a ship with the attendant expenses of pilotage, tonnage dues, and dock charges totaled more at Hamburg than at Antwerp, Rotterdam, Copenhagen Free Port, and Trieste. Taking for illustration one of the examples presented in the evidence which is typical, we find that the steamship Bethania, of the Hamburg-American Line, a vessel of 7,458 gross tons and 4,852 net tons register, with an average winter cargo of 3,800 long tons pieces and 4,700 tons bulk incoming and 9,000 tons gross outgoing, must pay $1,210.34 at Hamburg, as opposed to $972.74 at Antwerp, $794.68 at Rotterdam, $615.23 at Trieste, and $282.03 at Copenhagen Free Port.

The direct effect of the higher harbor dues at Hamburg is that water freights are in some cases slightly higher to Hamburg than to Bremen, Antwerp, and Rotterdam. Rates from the Black Sea are regularly somewhat higher to Hamburg. Freight rates from India and the River Plate, which can not as easily be explained on the basis of distance, are somewhat higher than to Hamburg.

The contest among the Atlantic ports in the United States for differential railway rates on import and export traffic suggests the possible competition among rival ports in different countries. Where there are government-owned railways a port can make direct appeal to the government to give aid in railway rates as a means of meeting competition at foreign ports. This has been done in practically all of the European countries situated in the commercial region we have been studying. The Scandinavian countries, Russia, Holland, Belgium, Austria, and Germany have all played at this game. In every country some navigation favors are given local ports and some apparent railway favors are in force.

The Dutch railways, for instance, have a sliding scale of rebates for import and export traffic done at Dutch ports. Sometimes there is a provision which limits the rebates to trade with certain specified ports. This is a long list, but in general it excludes only freight traffic with near-by European countries.

Hamburg has been affected particularly by the difficulty of getting traffic from the great industrial center of Germany located in Westphalia and Rhineland. A heavy drain on this traffic comes from Rotterdam. Although the Prussian State railways give special rates to move this traffic via Hamburg, it is of small effect. Hamburg has not such railway rates as make her a real competitor in this west German trade which goes either via Rotterdam or Antwerp.

Hamburg's hinterland extends into Austria and southeastern Germany. The Elbe has been a wonderful boon to Hamburg. Austria, however, has recently been making such railroad rates to her port of Trieste as to give Hamburg some real competition in this territory.

Competition has made Hamburg a base. What this means is illustrated by the water freight rates in the United States between New York and San Francisco. The Interstate Commerce Commission has said that the examination of rates shows that the water carriers have uniformly made their rates relative to rail rates between New York and San Francisco.

It can be said that Hamburg's competing ports have set their harbor dues relative to Hamburg's. They have gone under to bid for traffic. It can be said as well that in the way of railroad rates Hamburg's competing ports are calling for rates relative to the charges to Hamburg. As far as an advantage in rates for transportation goes, it is safe to say that Hamburg has no particular preferment.

Since it is impossible to explain Hamburg's superior shipping connections by pointing to lower harbor dues or lower railway rates to the hinterland, it remains that the superior facilities offered by her free-port arrangement must be the substantial factor.

19. CONSENSUS OF OPINION ON THE SUCCESS OF EUROPEAN FREE PORTS IS FAVORABLE.

The free ports at Hamburg, Bremen, and Copenhagen have the hearty indorsement of the officials in these cities, of the officers of their chamber of commerce, of the directors of the free-port warehouse companies, and of steamship lines and business men who use them. Careful inquiry among people of these various classes failed to bring out any evidence of dissatisfaction with the free ports.

President Bohlen, of the Hamburg Chamber of Commerce, went so far as to say that he considered Hamburg a place superior for commerce to Antwerp and Rotterdam, purely due to the fact of the free port at Hamburg.

The sentiment at Bremen is that the free port has been a big item in her growth as a port. At Copenhagen, where almost all the growth of the past 10 years has been in the section of the harbor comprised in the free port, the sentiment is that the free port has assisted Danish commerce at a time when it was needed.

At Antwerp and Rotterdam officials and members of the chamber of commerce approved of free ports in high-tariff countries.

I have a great many letters, but time will not permit reference to them. I should like, however, an opportunity to extend my remarks by incorporating them, or such of them as I deem to be germane, in the RECORD, together with a statement on the subject.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The letters referred to are as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, April 28, 1916.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: My attention has been called to House resolution 209, introduced by you on April 22, directing the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of War, and the Secretary of Commerce to report to Congress as to the advisability of the establishment of free ports.

This is a matter in which I am greatly interested, and I am pleased that you have introduced this resolution. I trust that it will receive favorable action, and I shall be pleased to cooperate fully in the investigations called for by the resolution.

Very truly, yours,

WILLIAM C. REDFIELD, Secretary.

STROHMEYER & ARPE CO.,
New York, May 9, 1916.

Hon. MURRAY HULBERT,
Washington, D. C.

SIR: Referring to House resolution 209, presented in the House of Representatives by you on April 22, 1916, I wish to say the following:

The merchant marine of the United States is a negligible factor to-day and our merchant marine amounts to practically nothing. Every thinking person in the United States will recognize the fact that a merchant marine is necessary to the prosperity of the United States, and some day, and probably before long, we shall have it. This terrible conflict now raging in Europe has opened to the American export trade channels which had been closed to us before the war. A large export business is being done, and while, after the war is over we shall probably have to lose a good part of it, some of it will remain in American hands. American goods will have been introduced in territories where formerly they were not known; American brands of merchandise will have become well known and will continue in demand, even after the war is over. New York is one of the largest seaports in the world and offers enormous advantages and facilities which could be taken advantage of. Unfortunately they are not being taken advantage of as they ought to be at the present time.

What would cities like Hamburg, Genoa, or many others in Europe be if they did not have a free port, a place or a zone comprising warehouses and factories offering the importer and exporter advantages which he can not enjoy in America? In these free ports, absolutely free from complicated customs laws and regulations, steamers and sailing vessels are arriving daily from all parts of the globe; raw materials are received from every part of the world and made into manufactured articles which are exported from this free port to all parts of the world. Whenever any goods are removed from this free port to enter either the city of Genoa or the city of Hamburg, or any other city where free ports are located, the customs duties of that particular country are collected and the articles are then used for home consumption; but on all the goods that are exported from the free port naturally there is no duty collected and export can be done without any hindrance from customs officials and regulations.

Free manufacturing zones are what the United States needs to extend its export trade and to be able to compete in all parts of the world. Just one instance I wish to cite to you, showing the workings of such a free zone if established. My firm imports very large quantities of olive oil from southern Europe. Upon arrival of the same we have to pay duty on this olive oil; we remove it to our warehouses, where this olive oil is prepared, filtered, refined, and then repacked from the large containers in which it is received into smaller containers, both in bottles and cans, and then exported to parts of the world from where we have the orders. Now, take, for instance, the trade in South America, which we are supplying now quite largely with olive oil—they have been buying their oil and are getting it still principally from southern Europe, but the large American importer having such a large outlet for the goods is always able to compete in the buying field and get certain advantages which the smaller buyers can not possibly obtain. Now, after we have handled this oil and repacked it, we receive a refund of part of the duty which we have paid from the United States—this is perfectly true, but we lose part of the duty; then, again, we lose also cartage to and from the warehouses, we lose the storage charges, we lose time and labor, leakage from the barrels, etc. Now, if we had our warehouse in a free zone, in the free port, we could do all this work right there without interference from customs officials and from customs regulations.

The United States customs would employ fewer officials, because only a very few would be needed to regulate the affairs of this free zone. Take, for instance, in this case of olive oil, by repacking these goods here, we encourage the American bottle industry, because we use American bottles for bottling this oil; we pack this oil into cans which are made in America, and cans which are lithographed here in America; therefore we support the American tinplate and the lithographing industries; we use American-made cases, American-made nails and case strapping; we employ American labor. Now, if the people in South America get this oil direct from Italy or Spain or elsewhere, all this benefit to American industry and labor is lost.

Olive oil is not the only article that is not produced in the United States and still is exported from here. We are receiving to-day, and we could receive in the future, if such a free port were established, millions and millions of dollars' worth of goods from all parts of the world in their raw state. Raw materials would be made into the finished product in this free port. American labor would be employed, and the American export trade would be benefited and boomed, and if we had this large export trade, which we are bound to get some day, the American merchant marine would soon be established on a firm footing, because if there is enough export business offered the ships would soon be found to carry the goods across the ocean.

Unless we do establish such a free port we shall never be able to meet the competition of European manufacturers after the war. It is true that we shall retain part of the trade, but never all of it. We are paying higher wages to the American laborer, and we ought to pay them more, because it costs more to live in the United States than elsewhere, but the United States Government should help the merchant to earn the money to be paid in higher wages to the labor. If we can have the whole world as a field to work in with our export trade, there is no reason in the world why we should ever have dull times. American ingenuity, American diligence, and American enterprise will soon find a way to compete in practically every field. It is a matter of record that in nine cases out of ten we can not compete with the other part of the world for export business where we have to import the raw materials and then manufacture the goods, but if we had free ports, this would be done away with, and we could compete without a shadow of a doubt.

Many sections of the United States would be benefited, and not only New York. The United States would soon be permanently a creditor Nation, and before long the United States will be the permanent financial center of the world. By the establishment of such a free port in New York, this part of New York would soon be the foremost one of the whole world. Practically every industry would be benefited; foreign nations that will send their raw materials to the United States will very often take American goods in return as payment for their raw material—another benefit to the trade of the United States.

There can be really no serious objection to the establishment of free ports in the United States. Every thinking man carefully considering the situation will agree with me that a free port would be a lasting benefit and a blessing to all trade and commerce of the United States.

You are at perfect liberty to use this letter as you may see fit, and I sincerely hope that by giving you these few arguments, to which many more can be added, will help the good cause along, and before long we may enjoy the benefits of free ports.

I beg to remain,

Very respectfully, yours, GUSTAVE PORGET.

LOS ANGELES CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
Los Angeles, Cal., May 15, 1916.

Hon. MURRAY HULBERT,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR. We wish to acknowledge receipt of your letter of the 5th instant, inclosing copy of House bill 209, in reference to the establishment of free ports within the limits of the established customs districts of the United States and the Panama Canal Zone, and in reply beg to advise that this organization has been greatly interested in the subject for several years.

The activities of the New York Merchants' Association have been carefully observed and our committees on commerce and foreign trade have given much thought and study to the problem.

Assuming that Congress will act favorably in the matter and authorize the establishment of several experimental free ports, we have asked that Los Angeles Harbor be given one of them. We feel that no port in the country is better adapted geologically for a free port. This city controls our port and plenty of land is available for manufacturing sites, warehouses, etc. No objection might be expected from inland manufacturers because there are so few of them, and we trust that the movement you have started will result in the establishment in the United States of this great economic move.

Hon. WILLIAM D. STEPHENS is advised as to our desires in this connection, and we will also be pleased to cooperate with you.

Very truly, yours.

SPAIN PROMULGATES RULES FOR HER "FREE PORTS"—UNITED STATES CONSUL GENERAL SENDS THE SUBSTANCE OF REGULATIONS ESTABLISHED TO GOVERN TARIFF FREE ZONE AT BARCELONA AND AT OTHER SPANISH COAST CITIES WHICH DESIRE SUCH ZONES.

The Merchants' Association has received from the Hon. Wilbur J. Carr, director of the Consular Service, a copy of a report made by the American consul general at Barcelona, Spain, giving the substance of a recent Spanish decree establishing a free port of Barcelona.

DECREE OF GENERAL APPLICATION.

"The royal decree under which the free customs one of Barcelona will be established, already promised by the central government of Spain as reported by this consulate general, is in substance given below," says the report. "The designation 'commercial depots' used is understood as a carefully limited customs zone, and the provisions of the decree are applicable not alone to Barcelona, but to any other city in Spain where such a zone may be petitioned for and granted.

ARTICLES OF THE DECREE.

"ARTICLE 1. The government may concede the establishment of commercial depots in such ports as it may deem advisable.

"ART. 2. The concession for the commercial depots is given to special organizations or mercantile companies constituted under the rules of the commercial code and domiciled in the respective localities.

"ART. 3. In order to receive a concession the request for the depots should be accompanied by:

"1. The plans, with description of the depots, indicating the situation in the port.

"2. A statement of the operations that the petitioner proposes to carry on in the same, and the tariff of fees for each one of them.

"3. The obligation to reimburse the treasury for expenses incurred in supervision and guarding the depots.

"The payment of charges for these expenses will be quarterly.

"The failure to pay for four alternate or consecutive quarters will produce ipso facto the forfeiture of the concession after having demanded payment of the concessionaire.

"The petitions will be published in the Gaceta of Madrid in order that within 30 days, counting from the day of such publication, the parties interested may lay before the chamber of commerce and official corporations the reasons for and against that which is petitioned.

ADMISSIBLE MERCHANDISE.

"Article 4. All merchandise the importation of which into Spain is not prohibited or limited by special laws, and domestic merchandise the exportation of which is permitted, will be admitted in the depots.

"Domestic merchandise on entry into the commercial depots loses its nationality as though sent abroad.

"Article 5. The following merchandise is not authorized to be entered or stored in the commercial depots: Cattle of all classes, fresh or refrigerated meats, cereals and flours of the same, rice, wine, seeds of vegetables, and preserved vegetables of all classes.

"Article 6. Merchandise entered in the commercial depots can not remain in them over four years. At the end of this period it must be either exported abroad or made available for consumption in Spain.

AUTHORIZATIONS TO BE GRANTED.

"Article 7. Within the commercial depots the operations performed may be exclusively those enumerated in this paragraph, under the supervision of the administration and of the representatives of the chamber of commerce of the Province where the depots may be established or of any other Spanish chamber of commerce that demands it, the latter offering in its petition to pay the expenses of the additional supervision.

"The authorizations solicited by the chamber of commerce are understood to be conceded if, within 15 days from the date of presentation, there has been no contrary decision by the ministry.

"The authorizations referred to in the first paragraph of article 7 are the following:

"First. Changing the packing of merchandise.
"Second. Division of the same into commercial classes.
"Third. Mixing or blending thereof to same end.
"Fourth. Shelling and roasting coffee and cacao.
"Fifth. Shearing of skins.
"Sixth. Pulverization of woods.
"7th. Washing of wools.
"8th. Extraction of oil of coconut and of oleaginous seeds.
"9th. All operations that augment the value of the goods deposited without essentially changing their nature.

"The Government may amplify the concessions referred to in the preceding paragraph concerning the operations of transformation of merchandise the admission of which into the commercial depots is not prohibited by royal decree, publishing the petitions in the Gaceta de Madrid and in the Boletin Oficial of the respective Provinces, in order that within a period of one month any necessary objections may be formulated, which the Government will transmit and decide upon within a period not exceeding 60 days.

PROHIBITED OPERATIONS.

"ART. 8. The following operations are absolutely prohibited in the commercial depots:

"1st. The mixing of olive oil with that of seeds.

"2d. The mixing of foreign sugar and saccharine and the like with food products.

"ART. 9. Domestic and foreign merchandise entered in the commercial depots is exempt from the payment of transport and harbor-works imposts where such are collected.

"Wood and boxes of wood for packing from abroad are excepted and remain subject to tariff rules in force or which may become effective later.

"Foreign merchandise reexported from the commercial depots is also exempt from the same imposts and taxes.

"Domestic merchandise exported abroad from the commercial depots will pay the transport and harbor-works imposts that would have been paid if the export had been made directly on entry in the commercial depots.

"Also the export tax will be collected on all merchandise which may be subject thereto.

"ART. 10. Merchandise proceeding from the commercial depots into Spain will pay the importation duties, transport and other charges as if it came directly from abroad, and be subject to the importation duties of the tariff and the regulations of the customhouses.

"ART. 11. The State does not guarantee the establishment or the continued existence of commercial depots, but when merchandise remains in such storehouses it will be under the protection of the law and will not be subject to reprisals, even in case of war with the countries whose citizens are owners, consignors, or consignees of such merchandise.

MAY STIPULATE EXCEPTIONS.

"ART. 12. It is prohibited to live or to sell at retail or to consume articles made or stored therein within the precincts of the commercial depots.

"Nevertheless, in the decree of concession for an establishment any exceptions to the foregoing dispositions in favor of the agents in charge of guarding and the personnel occupied in the depots will be stipulated.

"ART. 13. In the commercial depots all the laws, regulations, and treaties in force concerning industrial property, trade-marks, patents, and commercial names, as well as all other general laws, etc., of the Kingdom will be enforced when not conflicting with the taxation provisions of the present decree.

"ART. 14. The organizations holding the concession for the commercial depots will reimburse the State for the expenses of supervising and guarding the establishments, the amount of which and the form of payment shall be designated in granting the concession.

MINISTER TO MAKE RULES.

"ART. 15. The minister of the treasury will dictate the necessary provisions in order that the commercial depots which have been granted may conform to rules of this decree.

"He will likewise dictate the regulations necessary for fulfilling the same, detailing the manner of delimitation, of closing and isolating the premises from the rest of the national territory, as well as the manner of exercising strict vigilance for the customs at the entrance and exit for merchandise and for the manipulation of the latter.

"In the same way it will make regulations for the adequate enforcement of all the rules in this decree."

Hon. MURRAY HULBERT, M. C.,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

SIR: Your letter of May 26, with reference to H. Res. 209, introduced by you and referred to the Committee on Appropriations, has been received. I shall of course, be glad to cooperate in the matter of consideration of this measure and, without committing myself at the present time with regard to the establishment of such ports within the continental limits of the United States, desire to invite your attention to the inclosed copy of letter just received by me from Gen. George W. Goethals, the Governor of the Panama Canal, with reference to the extension of the provisions of your bill to the Panama Canal Zone. I concur in Gen. Goethals's recommendation that the legislation should not be adopted in so far as it relates to the Canal Zone.

Very respectfully,

THE PANAMA CANAL,
CANAL ZONE EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
Balboa Heights, May 12, 1916.

CHIEF OF OFFICE,
The Panama Canal, Washington, D. C.

SIR: I have to acknowledge the receipt of your communication of April 25, transmitting copies of House resolution No. 209, having reference to the establishment of free ports in the Canal Zone.

The bill is not very clear in its terms, but I take it that the author's purpose was to establish free trade between the ports of the United States and the Canal Zone. I am of the opinion that the bill is inexpedient, because the Canal Zone has no civil population except that connected with the canal and other branches of the Government service. There are no industries of a commercial, agricultural, or manufacturing character in the Canal Zone except those belonging to the Government, and the policy of Congress is against the development of the Canal Zone along those lines. In my judgment there is no room for such development, as all of the Canal Zone will be needed for governmental uses; that is to say, for the canal, the railroad, the Army and Navy, and other governmental activities. Consequently there are no commodities to export from the Canal Zone to the United States except those belonging to the Government.

On the other hand, if free trade were established between the Canal Zone and the United States, smuggling into the United States would be encouraged. It would not be difficult to introduce dutiable articles from the Republic of Panama into the Canal Zone, and from there they could be taken to the United States free of duty. Articles of considerable bulk could not be easily handled in that way, but commodities of small volume and light weight, such as diamonds, could be smuggled into the States in that manner very easily. In addition, an opportunity would be afforded to those engaged in illicit opium trade to traffic in that commodity in the United States by utilizing the free ports in the Canal Zone to enter the ports of the United States unprotested.

I am of the opinion that this legislation should not be adopted.

Respectfully,

GEO. W. GOETHALS,
Governor.

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE,
BUREAU OF FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC COMMERCE,
Equitable Building, June 16, 1916.

Hon. MURRAY HULBERT,
Committee on Rivers and Harbors,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. HULBERT: Complying with your request contained in your letter of May 5, I take pleasure in writing you concerning my views on the advisability of having a report rendered to Congress which shall set out the feasibility of establishing free ports within the customs districts of the United States and the Panama Canal. (H. Res. 209, 64th Cong., 1st sess.)

Since a free port expedites the handling of certain kinds of traffic, as I attempted to point out in a report which I made to the Merchants' Association of New York, it may reasonably attract particular attention at this time on account of the unfortunate congestion which has occurred at the port of New York during the past year. Let me specially point out in this connection that the great press of tonnage at this time is a warning of what may be expected later. Both railway and water borne traffic has been increasing for some years at an accelerated rate as statistics will prove. The war having made the United States even more of a manufacturing and trading nation will add to this rate of increase. Some sober thought should be given to the amount of traffic which will have to be handled 10 years from now and 20 years from now. Port development in the United States must proceed along the lines of comprehensive planning, as is wisely advocated by the Merchants' Association of New York.

In this light a free port is only part of comprehensive plans which must be carried out. The proposal of a free port does not involve supplanting existing facilities or curtailing existing values. It involves simply supplying special facilities for certain kinds of traffic in the most adequate manner. In New York a special district in the harbor could be reserved for a free zone, and other districts devoted to other kinds of cargo which are rapidly increasing in volume.

Congestion in New York Harbor has been a bad thing for our foreign trade during the war. Were England and Germany competing in neutral markets the burdens placed on our foreign commerce would have lost us many customers. In Australia importers have suffered severely from delayed shipments. They have frequently received documents ahead of shipments, and usually shipments do not arrive entire by the same vessel; where short cases may be consignees have not the faintest idea. Prompt and efficient delivery of orders is even more important in foreign trade than in domestic trade. Since New York and other American ports have such a tremendous amount of local traffic to handle it would be wise to segregate certain kinds of foreign trade in districts where quick and special attention may be given.

A great deal of attention is now being devoted in the United States to the development of our merchant marine, and to improvements in our foreign merchandising methods. If we make satisfactory progress in these directions, the United States should become a center for international distribution and our transit traffic should vastly increase. It will break down, however, unless we are able to provide suitable facilities for storing, showing, and transferring this merchandise. To make New York a world's market place we must have ships, efficient merchandising organizations, and convenient central market facilities, such as are provided in free ports.

Some of the topics which may be suitably investigated, it seems to me, are as follows:

1. Time taken in New York and other ports to get goods through the customs and into the bonded warehouses, and to get goods out of bond and aboard steamers for reexport.
2. Special cost due to bonding and storing transit cargo under present arrangements.
3. Types of foreign merchandise which could be advantageously displayed in attractive show rooms in free-port warehouses, thence to be imported into the United States or reshipped abroad. Example: European laces.
4. Lines of manufactures in the United States using imported raw materials which export the finished product.
5. Lines repacking and reexporting. Example: Olives, caviar, etc.
6. Erection in a free port of special plants for export trade which utilize raw material brought in by coastwise steamers.
7. Possible increase in transit traffic after the war.
8. Particular requirement at various United States ports.

Since I had the opportunity of studying free ports in Europe there has appeared to me to be nothing visionary about this scheme as applied to American conditions. When business men in the United States have had occasion to carefully consider the matter in the light of their own needs I believe that a demand will be created. Such a report as you indorse should result in showing the particular value of free ports to American trade.

Although I am at some distance from the United States, and have many complicated problems to deal with in Australia, I shall be very glad to assist you in any way I can whenever your care to call upon me.

Respectfully, yours,

PHILIP B. KENNEDY,
American Commercial Attaché.

NEW YORK, July 10, 1916.

Hon. MURRAY HULBERT,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The Merchants' Association of New York is very glad to acknowledge receipt of your letter of July 7, which states that House resolution 209 may come before the House of Representatives for consideration on Tuesday, July 11.

Permit us, first of all, to express our great pleasure in the fact that the general subject of the establishment of free ports in the United States is being given serious consideration by Congress at present.

The Merchants' Association has been interested in this subject since 1913, attempting to gather first-hand information which would indicate in a positive manner whether or not the establishment of similar ports in foreign countries has proven of material economic advantage to the countries in which they are located, and further whether or not the establishment of such ports within the United States could reasonably be expected to render similar aid and assistance to the domestic and foreign trade of the United States. With this in view the Merchants' Association sent a qualified expert abroad to make a personal survey and complete study of the leading foreign free ports, including all phases of their activities and results. His report, commending the establishment of such ports, was most favorably received by the committee which had this subject under consideration.

Briefly, the chief factors which influenced our committee to a favorable conclusion regarding the desirability of establishing free ports within the United States, and especially at the port of New York, lay in their realization of the fact that the advantages accruing from such free zones would benefit not only the seaboard territory near which they are located, but would, to a similar degree, aid and assist merchants and manufacturers throughout all of the hinterland tributary to the free-port area.

Free ports abroad have been used both as (a) market ports and (b) manufacturing ports.

Within the zone of the market port a market for raw materials develops which must affect materially the cost of the raw materials in question throughout the country. The fact that goods are received and stored within this territory and held for the most advantageous price, either within the country in which the free port is located or in a foreign market, adds to the availability, at short notice, of large supplies of the raw material in question, with a resulting tendency to keep down the price.

The manufacturing plants operating within the free zone have the right to utilize raw materials in the manufacture of products for foreign distribution without the payment of an import duty, a procedure which is recognized in principle by our Government in the system of drawbacks now allowed. Even if the manufactured products are later used in domestic trade, the country loses nothing, in that full duties are paid upon the actual entry of the goods, while the advantage of the cheap production of that portion of the product sold abroad reduces the price on that part of the product which enters domestic consumption.

The advantages to shippers, and therefore to all firms interested in marketing goods abroad, lies in part in the reduced cost of storing and packing commodities in the free port zone. The superior facilities usually found in such highly developed centers of shipping activity reduces the cost of loading and unloading vessels alongside their docks. This, in turn, with the other advantages, attract shipping to the port in question, as experience in Europe amply demonstrates. Again, ships may be more economically repaired in the free port zone, because stocks of duty free material are always on hand. This is shown by the fact that the free port of Hamburg has become the ship-repairing center of Europe.

Turning to the field of foreign trade, which is receiving nation-wide attention at present, the United States must realize that it will not be long before manufacturers and producers in this country must again face the competition of the great ports of the world with their facilities for reducing the cost of doing foreign business. A study by the Interstate Commerce Commission shows the cost of water transportation as being composed of approximately 60 per cent for charges incident to docking a vessel and 40 per cent for the charges of actual transportation. What a free port does is to cut down this major item in the cost of transportation, i. e., the 60 per cent which goes to terminal cost. It does this, in the first place, by quick service, which releases the heavy capital invested in ships and cargoes and makes a rapid turnover possible; it does it, secondly, by freeing quick capital which may be tied up as a result of customs regulations; and it does it, thirdly, by cutting down the operating costs of handling goods, due to large scale and specialized terminals located at the crossing of the ways for transportation. Competent authorities have stated that Germany's magnificent success in entering foreign markets has been, in considerable part at least, due to the economies resulting from the operation of her free ports.

For these reasons, therefore, the Merchants' Association of New York indorsed and advocated the establishment of a free port at the port of New York, believing that the operation of such a free zone at the leading shipping point within the United States would soon justify itself and prove its worth to the entire country.

Yours, very truly,

DEAR SIR: I thank you very much for sending me a copy of your resolutions providing that the various departments therein mentioned investigate and report to Congress as to the advisability of establishing free ports, etc.

We are heartily in favor of your resolutions. We believe that the matter should be thoroughly investigated, for it seems that the establishment of such free ports will be of great benefit to some of our industries and can not be hurtful to any industry.

I trust that you will keep us advised as to the progress of this matter, and I beg to assure you of our hearty cooperation.

Thanking you again, I am,
Respectfully, yours,

Hon. MURRAY HULBERT,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The establishment of free ports, is, I believe, the subject of House resolution 209.

Having given this subject careful study over a period of years, I believe that it is no overstatement to say that free ports are the solution in a big way of the basic problems which must be met in the contest for world supremacy.

The establishment of a free port is, of course, of first importance to the port of New York. It is, however, of the greatest importance to the whole country as well, both from the direct stimulus to trade and manufacturing, and in developing markets for the raw materials of the hinterland.

It is practically unquestioned among the best students of port, commercial, and industrial development, that the establishment of free ports was of the greatest significance in the development of the great new ports of Europe. The advantages resulting from having free ports can perhaps best be seen in the wonderful success which Germany enjoyed prior to the war in building up a world trade. This success was due in a very considerable measure to the economies and stimuli of the free ports which were established.

Will you not record the Institute for Public Service as indorsing the establishment of free ports, particularly for New York Harbor?

Very truly, yours,

INSTITUTE FOR PUBLIC SERVICE,

Hon. MURRAY HULBERT, M. C.,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Acknowledging your communication in reference to establishment of free port or ports, and to House resolution No. 209, introduced by you relating to this matter, we beg to say that the Maritime Association have given the matter attention at a meeting of the board of directors. We are thoroughly impressed with the importance of this subject and believe that a free port, if established in a proper location on New York Harbor, or nearby so as to have easy access to the sea and so situated that the various railroad lines coming into our city could easily enter the free zone, would be of inestimable value to the commerce of New York.

Various countries have from time to time opened free ports with great advantage to their trade. Every one is acquainted with the great success of Hamburg, and there is no reason why this should not be duplicated with us.

The advantage of those free zones is to have cheap storage facilities so that merchants could have depots for receiving, packing, and shipping goods quickly and promptly. Manufacturers have also used these ports abroad largely to manufacture in, being able to do so to greater advantage than in inland towns or cities, receiving the raw products both from their own country and from abroad, and being free from all complications such as exist when manufacturing has to be done in bonded warehouses, etc.

Hamburg also affords cheap and rapid facilities for discharging into steamers and lighters for distributing purposes. It enables vessels from all parts of the world to go to the free port, discharge without custom complications entire or part cargoes and do so with expedition.

For the repairs of ships promptly and economically free ports have been found to be most desirable and vessels can be repaired at Hamburg, it is claimed, cheaper than in any other part of Europe.

Manufacturers use these zones largely as branches, goods often being put together and packed for export, even if not entirely manufactured in the zone.

At the end of the present war this country will unquestionably have to face grave competition from the shipping ports of Europe, which will do their utmost undoubtedly to reduce the cost of doing export business.

Goods stored in the free zones not being subject to duty enables merchants abroad to utilize the advantages of such zones to wait for a market if they are not satisfied with the price at which goods are being sold, and those ports which offer these facilities undoubtedly attract raw products from all parts of the world.

Unquestionably Germany's success in rapidly building up her commerce and exploiting foreign markets is to some extent due to her economies resulting from free ports established.

For these and many other reasons which can not be gone into in this short communication we feel that the proposition should be given most careful consideration, and investigation by the National and State authorities, and therefore we are heartily in favor of House resolution 209.

Respectfully, yours,

J. B. MURRELL, President.
JOS. M. DAVID, Secretary.

Steamship Oceano arrived May 24, 1916; fire broke out in the No. 1 hold on May 26 while discharging her cargo at pier No. 2, American Docks, Staten Island. Among cargo damaged was 219 bales sugar bags in transit for Cuba. As a better price can be obtained for damaged bags in New York than in Cuba, it was decided to sell them at this port. In order to do this the goods were placed on a barge under Government supervision and the owners of the goods were requested to make application for appraisement of these bags, and full duty was paid on damaged bags. In order to ascertain number of bales damaged, marks, etc., it was necessary to await delivery of sound bales before complete entry could be made in customhouse. The last permit to remove the goods was not filed until June 8. Then the lighter was moved to a warehouse and goods discharged for sale, and barge was made light on July 11. The cost was as follows:

Lighterage, 33 days, at $30 per day	$990
Extra expenses handling cargo	589
Total	1,579

Besides this $9,198 was paid in duty on these 219 bales, being the full amount, so that the owners will have to await the final liquidation of these shipments before they can obtain their refund of duty as per appraisement of the damaged goods.

Steamship Canastota, outward bound; a fire broke out in this cargo on December 8, 1915, while loading at pier No. 37, Brooklyn. There was a shipment of iron pipe from Page Hersey Iron Works, of Canada, to Australia. This pipe was damaged by water used to extinguish the fire; and as it was in bond it was necessary to discharge hold on lighter and reload this pipe, as it could not be sold here without paying the duty and creating endless expense for handling, and was therefore sent forward in a damaged condition, and when discharged at destination it was worthless. The loss on this pipe, which could have been saved if properly handled here under a free port, was several thousand dollars. This is only one of many items on this boat, the cargo comprising 3,200 shipments.

Other vessels on fire in New York recently were steamship California, loading for Glasgow; steamship Bolton Castle, loading for Shanghai and Japan; steamship San Francisco, arrived from Buenos Aires; steamship Ioannina, arrived from Greece; steamship Lincluden, arrived from Calcutta; steamship City of Bristol, loading for Japan; steamship Villa de Rouen, arrived from Marseille; steamship La Drome, arrived from Bordeaux; steamship Hermion, loading for South America; and steamship Kandahar, arrived from Calcutta.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I should question very much whether the 150 editorials in favor of the gentleman's proposition had added anything to the sum of knowledge. It is self-evident that the editors who wrote the editorials knew nothing about the subject but wrote them because some association prepared them and sent them to the newspapers, practically in the form that they appear. The very purpose of the inquiry is to obtain information in regard to it. The gentleman urges the proposition because newspaper editorials have already decided it and told what a great thing it would be to have a free port.

I visited a free port once. It was St. Thomas, in the West India Islands. I think everybody on board the ship went ashore and laid in a stock of goods. It was said there, and I believe it was true, that goods could be bought cheaper there than anywhere else in the world, outside possibly of the Orient. There were no duties or charges of any kind whatever. The reason for maintaining a free port was because that was the Mecca at that time of all the ships engaged in the West India trade which by any manner or process could get to St. Thomas.

Now, I do not know just what effect a free port would have in the United States, but I suppose its practical effect would be that all the foreign ships plying to our shores, which are now required to buy more or less in the American market and to pay American prices, with a free port would pay foreign prices and obtain all of their supplies without paying anywhere near the sum they are paying now. That is the case wherever there is a free port. That was the case at St. Thomas and the case at Hongkong, in the British possessions, where I believe there is a free port.

Mr. HULBERT. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. HULBERT. Can the gentleman tell me whether that is the case in the free port at Hamburg?

Mr. MANN. It is to a very large extent.

Mr. HULBERT. And Copenhagen and Barcelona?

Mr. MANN. I do not know whether those are free ports or not.

Mr. HULBERT. Evidently the gentleman might be enlightened as to the working of the modern-day free port instead of taking one in the Danish West India Islands which has been abolished.

Mr. MANN. It has not been abolished. I can give the gentleman that information. I do not pretend to have the information, but it is very certain that the gentleman, while he professes to, has very little.

Now, I am not going to insist on the point of order, although I have very little confidence in any report that will be made by the Secretary of Commerce and the Secretary of the Treasury on the subject. Of course, I know perfectly well that a few importers in New York City would like to have a little zone of that city, where they control the price of everything, as a free port, and the gentleman, looking out for his constituents and at their instance, is offering a proposition to obtain information. I seldom have opposed a proposition to obtain information, and I am going to withdraw the point of order.

Mr. HULBERT. Will the gentleman yield and allow me to read three lines from a report?

Mr. MANN. I will allow the gentleman to read it in my time.

Mr. HULBERT. This is a report prepared by Hon. Philip B. Kennedy, now commercial attaché, representing the United States Government at Melbourne, Australia, who says:

We find an investigator of the Chicago harbor commission saying a few years ago that were Chicago to become a free port she could become the greatest port in the world.

Mr. MANN. If Chicago were to become a free port she would become the greatest port in the world, but it is not possible for Chicago to become a free port, and we do not want it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. HULBERT) there were 18 ayes and 13 noes.

The Clerk read section 2, as follows:

SEC. 2. That nothing contained in the act entitled "An act to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies," approved July 2, 1890, shall be construed as declaring to be illegal an association entered into for the sole purpose of engaging in export trade and actually engaged solely in such trade, or an agreement made or act done in the course of export trade by such association, provided such association, agreement, or act is not in restraint of trade within the United States.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment at the Clerk's desk pending, waiting to be read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. VOLSTEAD: Page 2, line 19, after the words "United States," strike out the period, insert a comma, and add "and does not restrain the export trade of the United States."

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer just a word in explanation. I called attention some time ago to the fact that this bill does not guard Americans who may be engaged in the export trade against the effect of this bill. It permits one person engaged in export trade to restrain the export trade of some one else in the United States; that is, some one who attempts to export goods from the United States. My object is to protect all those engaged in the export trade——

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, in order to save time, I accept the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, on page 2, after line 19, by inserting a semicolon in lieu of the period after the word "States," and inserting the following: "Provided, That no association shall have the benefit of the provisions of this act until it shall secure from the Federal Trade Commission a permit to engage in business under the provisions of this act, which permit said commission is authorized to issue, and the said commission is hereby authorized to revoke said permit, after a hearing granted such associations, upon finding that the such association has engaged in unfair methods of competition, or that its business is in restraint of trade in the United States, or that through its export trade such association is materially controlling the prices of products in the United States or substantially lessens competition within the United States in articles of the kind exported by any association."

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order against the amendment.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I should not think there would be any question about the amendment being in order. Now, I think this is a very important amendment and it ought to be adopted. I call the attention of the members of the committee to the fact that in section 2 it says that certain things may be done provided such association, agreement, or act is not in restraint of trade within the United States. Now, then, in section 3 it says that certain things may be done if the effect of such acquisition or ownership may be to restrain trade or substantially lessen competition within the United States, and so forth. Now, here is the question. You say that this shall not apply if the effect of this is to lessen competition or if it restrains trade in the United States, and I will pause for a reply, Who is to determine what the effect of this is?

Mr. WEBB. These same officers who administer the Sherman antitrust law and the Clayton law will enforce this law if there is any restraint of trade or unfair competition.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Who are the same officers?

Mr. WEBB. All of the Department of Justice of the United States, from the Attorney General down to the district attorneys and the assistant district attorneys with all their force.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. If it is done either by the Federal Trade Commission or the Attorney General all they could do would be to bring an injunction or proceeding to stop their business. Is not that right?

Mr. WEBB. That is all they can do now with unfair competition that may be practiced in the United States.

Mr. HASTINGS. As I understand the effect of the amendment it requires them first to get a permit from the Federal Trade Commission and then if they violate the provisions of this act or permit any unfair practices then the Federal Trade Commission has a right to revoke their license. That is the effect.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Yes; now, we found out that the process of the Attorney General was slow. It took years and years to determine something. We created the Federal Trade Commission in order to expedite this business and gave the administrative part of it, perhaps some judicial powers, to them to do certain things and to do them quickly. Now, then, we ought to give the Federal Trade Commission, who are to have the supervision over this and to whom they must report, power to issue permits and licenses, so to speak. Then when that board shall determine, after hearing that the effect of this business is to lessen competition or the effect is to restrain trade, then you have directly authorized this commission to give them a hearing, and if they find the fact as you set out here, then they have the power to revoke that license. Now, as you know, I am opposed to the passage of this bill. I think it is a dangerous bill, but if it is to pass you ought to throw over it every safeguard possible.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I ask for five minutes more. I have not taken up any time since general debate began.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma? (After a pause.) The Chair hears none.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Now, then, the Federal Trade Commission bill makes unfair methods of competition unlawful, but it is no crime, however. And one of these corporations that we are proposing to create may engage in all kinds of unfair competition, it being no crime. It is unlawful, but there is no penalty provided. If prosecution can be had for unfair competition——

Mr. WEBB. I will call my friend's attention to line 9, on page 4, requiring all of these associations to file with the Federal Trade Commission—their articles or contracts of association and of all contracts, agreements, and understandings had with any foreign or domestic association in regard to the conduct of or practices in foreign trade. Any association which shall fail so to do shall not have the benefit of the provisions of section 2 and section 3 of this act, and it shall also forfeit to the United States the sum of $100 for each and every day of the continuance of such failure, which forfeiture shall be payable into the Treasury of the United States and shall be recoverable in a civil suit in the name of the United States—

And so forth. That is a very severe penalty.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. That is very strict. All they are compelled to do there is to tell the Federal Trade Commission what they are doing.

Mr. WEBB. Section 4 of the act puts it exclusively and entirely under the supervision of the Federal Trade Commission.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. The Federal trade act makes unfair competition unlawful and there is no penalty

Mr. WEBB. Nor is there any penalty for unfair practices among American corporations. The only thing that can be done is to restrain them under Federal injunctions, and, if they violate the injunction, put them in jail. If that is sufficient remedy for unfair competition in the United States it is sufficient for unfair competition without or beyond the United States.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. You ought to have some summary process.

Mr. GARD. Is not the gentleman familiar with the language on page 4, lines 11 and 12 of this act, as follows:

Any association which shall fail so to do shall not have the benefit of the provisions of section 2 and section 3 of this act.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. That is——

Mr. GARD. That is equivalent to a forfeiture of a charter to do business.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. The preceding matter says that they shall make report. Now, if they fail to make the report they forfeit $100 for each and every day during the continuance of such failure.

Mr. GARD. And not have the benefit of the provisions of sections 2 and 3.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. I understand that, if they have not made report. If they have engaged in unfair practices, there is no provision here that says they shall not have the benefit of it. In other words, there is no process there. The only thing you have got here is that they are required to make report. If they do not do it, they are subject to a fine and the right to do business can be forfeited, but that report might contain things which would indicate that they were really controlling prices; that they were really cornering the trade in the United States, and yet there would be no power except to get an enjoinment.

Mr. GARD. That report would of itself take from them the provisions of sections 2 and 3.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. No, sir.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I am very glad this bill is before the House. There has been some criticism of it. I think I have seldom seen in my experience in the House a bill more carefully drawn than this bill is. I do not know who drew it, but I assume that some very careful gentlemen connected with the Federal Trade Commission had something to do with it.

Mr. Chairman, shortly after the European war broke out I made a little speech in this House and said what seemed to me to be patent then and more patent now, that while this war was going on in Europe, primarily caused, as I believed, to determine who should control the trade of the world, it was the duty of the United States while the others were fighting about it to take possession of the trade of the world. I believe that we ought to be extending our trade, especially in South America, Africa, the isles of the sea, and to some extent in the Orient. We ought to furnish every facility possible. It is true that while other countries, like England and Germany, through their Governments, have been giving aid to their citizens and extending their trade, our Government has been seeking to hinder trade. Our legislation in the main has been aimed to prevent aid. I do not say that that has been improper, in the effort to preserve competition at home and prevent monopoly. But the tendency of legislation with us has been to interfere with men doing business, while the tendency of other governments has been to encourage and give aid to men in their own countries doing business. Our business has grown in spite of Government laws, while the business of other countries has grown by the aid of Government legislation. I think the time is now here when we ought to aid our people in the foreign trade, both by additional banking facilities and by permitting them to combine. We passed an act the other day which allows our banks at home to become interested in banks abroad.

This bill proposes to allow the producers of the United States to combine in order that they may show to foreign countries the need of their goods, and offer them inducements by which the foreigners will buy our goods, as against the competition of other countries.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. The United States Steel Corporation does not desire this bill; the International Harvester Co. does not desire this bill. Both of those great companies have plants within my district. They do not need the legislation, because they are strong enough and powerful enough to have their own agencies for the disposal of their own goods. But I have got a lot of plants in my district in competition with the United States Steel Corporation and the International Harvester Co. which are not strong enough to have their own agents in South America. We have our consular agents doing a little; not much; they can not do much. We have a commercial attaché in various countries—eight, I believe, all told—doing a little; they can not do much. The only way you can sell goods in the main is to show your goods. We have got to make, if we are going to extend our foreign trade, goods which the foreigners want, the kind they want. In the past we have endeavored to tell them that they did not know what kind of goods they wanted; that they ought to use the kind of goods we use and the kind we want to make.

We have got to make the goods they want. We have also got to learn how to pack goods. The constant complaint for years of every consul, sent in reports to the United States, has been that Americans, used to packing goods only for transportation in their own country, packed their goods so carelessly that when they arrived in foreign ports the foreign purchasers were disgusted with them and said they would not, in many cases, give another order.

We have got to teach our people these things. In order to teach them, we have got to let them combine that they may learn. We have got to enable the smaller manufacturers to send their goods into warehouses in the various ports of the world so that the foreigners may see the goods. Under the present law—whether it covers that or not—they have been afraid to make any kind of a combination. This bill proposes to lift the ban.

I believe, Mr. Chairman, that the time is ripe for us to induce people in foreign lands to buy the things we make. There ought to be no agricultural implement used in any country, in South America or Africa, which is not made in the United States. [Applause.] We ought to send our cotton goods into those countries, and we can do it. We have a line of sundries which are demanded throughout the world, and we can make the kinds which the foreigners want. But we can not do it until we know and until we are prepared to show what we can do.

There never was an opportunity before in all the history of the world for any one country to so expand its foreign trade and so increase the quantity of goods which it sells abroad as there is offered to the United States while the great manufacturing countries of Europe are engaged in the present unfortunate war. While we may be sorry for them, while we may regret the strife over there, it is our duty, if we are statesmen, to endeavor to provide for the prosperity of our own land and extend our own trade into foreign lands. [Applause.]

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HICKS] asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

Mr. WEBB. Pending that, Mr. Chairman, I hope the committee will dispose of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MORGAN]. I hope the committee will vote that amendment down.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from North Carolina withdraw the point of order against the amendment?

Mr. WEBB. Yes. I concede that the intentions of my friend from Oklahoma are entirely good, but I think the bill itself expresses what he really wants better than the gentleman expresses it in his amendment. I think the bill covers what the gentleman wants, and we pointed it out to him in the debate; and I hope the committee will not mutilate the bill by adopting his amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MORGAN].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] is now recognized.

Mr. RAKER. I offer an amendment.

The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from California.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. RAKER: Amend, page 2, line 16, after the word "such," insert the word "exports."

Mr. WEBB. We have no objection to that, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I want a couple of minutes to speak on the bill. Although the amendment is adopted, I ask unanimous consent to speak for two minutes. I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I find that the people in the West who are interested in export trade have given this bill very careful consideration. There are many matters of export on the Pacific slope and in the Rocky Mountains tributary thereto, and the small business men and some of the larger concerns in the lumber industry and others believe that this legislation will bring about a condition that will permit the organization of a selling agency by which they will be able to get the export trade not only in Europe but in South America and in the Orient, to the advantage of this country and to the advantage of those who desire to purchase.

There is merit in this legislation. No one can be harmed. It is guarded about so far as the States are concerned, and the present law upon the subject is not in any way affected. I shall therefore heartily support and vote for this legislation, believing that it is wise, that we need it at the present time, and that it will expand America's trade as it ought to be expanded.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. That nothing contained in section 7 of the act entitled "An act to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes," approved October 15, 1914, shall be construed to forbid the acquisition or ownership by any corporation of the whole or any part of the stock or other capital of any corporation organized solely for the purpose of engaging in export trade, and actually engaged solely in such export trade, unless the effect of such acquisition or ownership may be to restrain trade or substantially lessen competition within the United States in articles of the kind exported by the association whose stock is acquired or controlled.

Mr. STAFFORD. I move to strike out all of the section after the words "United States," in line 5, page 3.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. STAFFORD: Page 3, line 5, after the words "United States" strike out the remainder of the paragraph.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I had hoped that the chairman of the committee would at first sight accept the amendment, because the words proposed to be stricken out certainly do not affect the main purpose of the exceptions to the Clayton Antitrust Act, sought to be accomplished by this section. Section 7 of the Clayton Antitrust Act forbids any corporation from owning stock in another corporation which may substantially lessen competition, and here you seek to except those associations formed under this bill which will not restrain trade or substantially lessen competition within the United States. Then you follow that with the limitation which I seek to eliminate—

In articles of this kind exported by the association whose stock is acquired or controlled.

I contend that that adds nothing to the exception which the committee seeks to lift; but there is this danger, that by permitting corporations to be organized for the control of the foreign trade they may, with an ulterior purpose, combine so as to affect the prices of commodities in the United States.

Mr. WEBB. I see the point the gentleman is driving at, and I have no objection to the amendment. I do not want any of these corporations to restrain trade at all, whether it is export or any other.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I ask the indulgence of the committee for five minutes, in order that I may make a matter of record certain extracts from the report of the proceedings of the American Federation of Labor held at San Francisco, Cal., November 8 to 22, inclusive, 1915.

I desire this to go into the RECORD in order that the gentlemen who were concerned about their votes yesterday on the strike question may thoroughly understand the attitude of organized labor on this question of establishing an eight-hour day by law.

It will be of interest to many, I am sure, to know that the American Federation of Labor is on record by a very large vote against the establishment of an eight-hour day by legislation, holding that the question of hours and wages is one for the unions themselves to determine. This may account for certain suggestions that came to us yesterday that the brotherhoods did not ask Congress to interfere in their behalf.

The question arose through the introduction at the San Francisco convention of the American Federation of a resolution offered by a delegate from the Illinois State Federation of Labor, Mr. John J. Fitzpatrick, which resolution provided that whereas the Illinois State Federation of Labor had gone on record in favor of an eight-hour day by legislation, therefore the American Federation should go on record in favor of establishing an eight-hour day by legislation.

THE ILLINOIS STATE RESOLUTION.

That matter was referred to the committee on resolutions, and the committee on resolutions brought in a report, quoting the Fitzpatrick resolution as follows:

Resolution No 152, by Delegate John J. Fitzpatrick, of the Illinois State Federation of Labor.

Whereas the Illinois State Federation of Labor adopted a resolution favoring the establishment of the eight-hour workday by legislation by the adoption of the following resolution:

"Resolved by the thirty-third annual convention of the Illinois State Federation, That we go on record and hold solid for the eight-hour workday by legislation, both industrially and politically, and that every delegate use all of his influence in his local union and boost for the eight-hour law by legislation, that some day we will all be working eight hours per day and thereby keeping in line with the increased productiveness of modern machinery."

Therefore be it

Resolved by this convention, That the spirit, intent, and purpose of the foregoing resolution be adopted by this convention.

Referred to committee on resolutions.

RESOLUTIONS COMMITTEE SUBSTITUTE.

The recommendation of the committee on resolutions was as follows:

Your committee is of the opinion that one of labor's first great victories was the winning of industrial freedom through the repeal of those laws through which the workers' terms of employment had been largely determined by legislative and judicial authorities, and the establishment of the workers' privilege to organize on the industrial field, and through their collective strength enforce their right to have a determining voice in the terms of their employment.

Your committee recommends as a substitute for the resolution the indorsement of the executive council's report on shorter workday, which reads in part:

"It is an accepted principle that the shorter workday is a fundamental step in the betterment of the workers. The shorter workday affects the length of life, the health, the standards of life, and, in fact, every phase of the lives of the workers. The wage earner whose hours of labor are decreased goes to work and comes from work at a different time than before, and consequently comes in contact with people whose habits of living are different. From contact with these people of greater leisure, he establishes new ideals. He has a greater number of hours in which to rest, revive his energies, and devote to recreation, or the development of his mind. Thus the shorter workday makes of the worker a different person, a person of greater physical endurance, greater vitality, higher ideals, and consequently a person who will not be satisfied with the old standards of the long hours of work.

"The improved methods of production which always follow a reduction in the hours of labor increase the productive power of the worker, and consequently he is in a position to demand and receive higher wages. Invariably every decrease in the hours of work per day is accompanied or followed by an increase in wages. The shorter workday movement is to secure to the workers greater material advantages. It is an important movement in conserving national vigor and health, and in guarding against those tendencies that undermine true national power."

QUESTION FOR THE UNIONS THEMSELVES.

From this is evident the importance of the action of the Philadelphia convention in adopting the following:

"The American Federation of Labor, as in the past, again declares that the question of the regulation of wages and the hours of labor should be undertaken through trade-union activity, and not to be made subjects of laws through legislative enactment, excepting in so far as such regulations affect or govern the employment of women and minors, health and morals, and employment by Federal, State, or municipal government."

The economic strength of the organization determines the bargaining power of that organization. One of the objective points which the anthracite miners include in their demands for the new 1916 contract is the eight-hour workday. They have wisely planned their campaign in advance and have measured their forces, so that they will be in the best position possible to enforce their demands. It is very significant that the gains that have been made in shortening the workday in private industries throughout the country have been fundamentally due to the influence of the economic power in the trade organizations and have been secured through economic action. Also significant in connection with this is the recommendation of the Federal Commission on Industrial Relations: "The regulation by legal enactment of hours of work of adult workmen is not generally practicable or desirable except for public employees." It can not be overemphasized that the wage earners must depend upon their economic organizations for securing a shorter workday. This method is not only effective in securing for the workers this fundamental step in their betterment, but it enables them at the same time to maintain their independence and their resourcefulness, together with the right to determine those things which affect the conditions of work under which they must toil.

AGAINST DELEGATING AUTHORITY TO LEGISLATURES.

To secure the shorter workday by any other method makes it necessary for the wage earners to delegate to other authorities other things which vitally affect them, and which constitute a limitation upon their activities and their rights, and thus finally lessen their freedom.

Because of the far-reaching importance and effect of the shorter workday upon the material, physical, and mental conditions of the working people, we can not too strongly impress upon all wage earners the necessity to concentrate their chief effort to secure the shorter workday—the general application of at least the eight-hour day.

We therefore recommend that all wage earners—all the toilers of America—unite and make common cause for the attainment of this economic, social, political, and moral boon at the earliest possible day. No proposition more sound economically, sociologically, and humanely can be adopted than the enforcement of the general eight-hour workday for all the workers engaged upon any field of human endeavor.

GOMPERS DEMANDS FREEDOM OF ACTION.

There was a lengthy debate upon the report, which brought President Samuel Gompers to his feet for the wind-up. Mr.

Gompers made an eloquent speech in support of the committee report, and, among other things, said:

"The miners' organization for the miners of Colorado, the metalliferous miners and the coal miners, tried to secure an eight-hour workday for their trade. The American Federation of Labor and its officers helped to the fullest of their ability. When the telegraphers asked for regulation of their hours of labor by law we aided them to the fullest extent of our ability. If the miners want that regulation by law, if the telegraphers want that regulation by law, let them have it, but you can not force it down the throats of other trade-unionists and workingmen who understand the history and the tendency of such legislation. You can not foist it upon us.

"I am not afraid of a fight. I am not afraid of a struggle. I am not afraid of what the intensity of the struggle for right, for justice, for freedom, for a shorter workday means. I think I have a good understanding of the enemy of labor. I think I understand a little more than some the subtlety of their action and the knavishness of their activities. I am not willing to go into the spider's web with all the spider's golden trimmings or all his allurements.

LITTLE TO ASK OF CONGRESS.

"I want freedom to act, and the only demand which I will make of Congress is to do for the workers what we cannot do for ourselves—where the Government is the employer to secure the shorter workday by law, because it can be secured no other way. But, primarily, I want the Government to secure to us by law the right to exert and exercise the normal human activities of self-development and associated effort and to bear the burdens of the struggle for industrial improvement and freedom, and so that we may fight the battles, not by a piece of paper dropped in an urn or a beautifully carved ballot box, but by scars of battle, by the hunger of the stomach, of the weeping and the wailing of life, and still stand true to the battle line of labor. That is the fight I am making. I want freedom to fight and freedom to achieve, and I will never consent to anything else."

FEDERATION AGAINST LEGISLATIVE INTERFERENCE.

Immediately after that speech by Mr. Gompers the convention took a vote, which vote was declared by Secretary Morrison to be 8,500 in favor of the committee's report and 6,396 against its report. The American Federation of Labor, therefore, at its most recent convention declared that it did not want to establish an eight-hour day by law. It wanted to be free from such legislation as is now going to the President on the subject of hours and wages.

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the bill that was passed yesterday.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks.

Mr. RAKER. I make the same request.

Mr. ADAMSON. Do I understand the gentleman desires to extend his remarks on the bill passed yesterday?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not so understand.

Mr. ADAMSON. We thought we would wait until Monday about that.

Mr. TEMPLE. I knew of no such arrangement.

Mr. ADAMSON. My purpose was to ask for general leave to print on Monday and the Republican leader, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], intimated he would not object to that.

Mr. TEMPLE. I ask leave to withdraw my request. I knew of no such arrangement.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman withdraws his request. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent and the gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent to extend their remarks. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. That is, not upon yesterday's proceedings?

Mr. RAKER. It is in reference to Federal aid to good roads. I desire to insert the rules and regulations provided by the department, as I have been getting letters and telegrams in reference to it. This is to enable the people to get it.

Mr. MANN. They will not get it out of the RECORD.

Mr. RAKER. I will send some of the RECORDS to them.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from California, whenever a department issues a regulation desires to put it in the RECORD. These people do not see the RECORD. They can get the regulations from the department. They are printed for that purpose, and they have got plenty of money, and they are in readable form, and they are not in readable form in the RECORD.

Mr. RAKER. To avoid any complication, I ask unanimous consent that they be printed as a document.

Mr. MANN. It is not our business to print them; the department prints them.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I demand the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The regular order is demanded, and the regular order is: Is there objection to the request?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I will have to object to the request.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection made to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky to extent his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. STAFFORD. Upon what subject; not on the subject of the strike situation?

Mr. BARKLEY. No.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma: Page 3, line 7, after the word "controlled," strike out the period and insert a colon and add the following: "Provided, That the provisions of this act shall not apply to any corporation with a capital stock in excess of $1,000,000."

Mr. GARD. In order to correct the gentleman's amendment I desire to say that by the previous amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] the words beginning in line 5, page 3, "in articles of the kind," and so forth, were stricken out. The gentleman had better change his amendment.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. I ask that it be inserted after the words "United States," line 5, page 3.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be corrected.

There was no objection.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to take up time urging this amendment. There has been a good deal said, however, that the main object of this bill was to let the little corporation in; that the big corporation did not want it; that the Steel Trust and other great business organizations having large capital did not want it and did not need it.

Mr. WEBB. Does the gentleman think that a corporation with a capital of $1,000,000, which would probably have to spend $100,000 in advertising, could compete very well with the Steel Trust? The gentleman is going to tie the hands of the little fellows so that the big fellows can gobble them up, because the gentleman remembers in the hearings one man spoke of one corporation that in one year spent $700,000 in advertising and presenting its wares and goods to the foreign markets. If the gentleman limits it to $1,000,000, then he is going to let the big fellows control.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman consent to any limitation?

Mr. WEBB. I do not know that I would consent to any.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. That is just exactly what I thought. The gentleman gets up and contends for the benefit of the little fellow, and yet, when I ask some limitation, the gentleman says no. In other words——

Mr. FORDNEY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. I would be glad to yield.

Mr. FORDNEY. I want to say to the gentleman when he fixes such a limitation it does not accomplish the purpose the gentleman has in mind. The gentleman knows but 7 per cent of the products of this country are exported, and a very small proportion of any man's products goes abroad, and especially in the lumber business. Not more than 5 per cent of any man's products of the Southern States of long-leaf pine is sold abroad, and in putting any limitation the gentleman would absolutely exclude more than one-half the export of lumber from this country.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. I will ask the gentleman the same question I asked the chairman of the committee, if he would consent to any limitation?

Mr. FORDNEY. I would consent to a limitation if I knew the amount of a man's product that is going abroad compared with the amount of his capital.

Do you know what proportion or percentage of the products of the United States Steel Co. goes abroad? Mr. Schwab made a statement before a committee here under oath that there had not been one pound of steel rails sold by any manufacturer of steel rails in this country to a steel-producing country in 10 years, not a rail, except a very small amount that had gone to northwestern Canada, for which his firm had received $2 per ton more than they received in this country. Now, if you can tell the percentage of the exports as compared to the total——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for one minute more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Now, then, the fact is you will not put any limitation on it. You propose to allow all the big corporations to combine as they see fit. The Secretary of Commerce in his report spoke about permitting the small concerns to combine. That was the main argument made by the Federal Trade Commission in the hearings, and that is the main argument that has been presented here by those who are favoring this bill, and yet I offer a limitation and you object to that, just as I expected you to do.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may extend my remarks in the RECORD on this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MORGAN].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. That the prohibition against "unfair methods of competition" and the remedies provided for enforcing said prohibition contained in the act entitled "An act to create a Federal Trade Commission, to define its powers and duties, and for other purposes," approved September 26, 1914, shall be construed as extending to unfair methods of competition used in export trade against competitors engaged in export trade, even though the acts constituting such unfair methods are done without the territorial jurisdiction of the United States.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment by way of a new section.

Mr. DILLON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out section 4.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Dakota offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 8, strike out section 4.

Mr. DILLON. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that this section is wholly unnecessary, because the word "commerce" is defined in the Federal Trade Commission act, as follows:

"Commerce" means commerce among the several States or with foreign nations, or in any Territory of the United States or in the District of Columbia, or between any such Territory and another, or between any such Territory and any State or foreign nation, or between the District of Columbia and any State or Territory or foreign nation.

In view of that definition and the act of the Trade Commission, it seems to me that this section is wholly unnecessary, because it is covered by that act.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, in answer to that I will say to my friend I do not think he wants to strike out the section. It gives the Trade Commission new jurisdiction. At present the Trade Commission would not have anything to do with unfair competition between two American exporters in China, and this act preserves the power of the Trade Commission over the two American exporters, wherever they are in all the world, and if one acts unfairly toward the other in any portion of the world, that one can be brought before the Trade Commission and enjoined. I think it important to leave it in.

Mr. DILLON. Very well.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. DILLON].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment in the nature of a new section.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Page 3, after line 17, insert:

"That any steamship company, express company, or other common carrier by water engaged in commerce with foreign nations, and each and every officer, agent, servant, or employee of any and every such steamship company, express company, or other common carrier by water, who shall not treat alike all persons, firms, and corporations tendering to him, her, it, or them goods, wares, or merchandise for transportation, or who shall for any reason or in any manner discriminate against any person, firm, or corporation so tendering him, her, it, or them goods, wares, or merchandise for carriage or transportation to any foreign country or who shall receive for transportation and thereafter willfully delay the transportation of any such goods, wares, or merchandise, and each and every officer, agent, servant, and employee of any such common carrier who shall aid, assist, or participate in any such discrimination or delay by any such common carrier whose officer, agent, servant, or employee he or she is, shall for each offense be fined not more than $25,000 or imprisoned not more than five years, or both."

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on that.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, the amendment is not subject to a point of order, but if the gentleman thinks it is I would be very glad if he would make the point of order and let me discuss that. That is, if the gentleman in the end intends to make the point of order.

Mr. WEBB. I do make the point of order. I think it is not germane to the bill at all, and therefore I make it.

Mr. BENNET. I would like to be heard on that.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will be glad to hear the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET] on the point of order.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, this is a bill to promote export trade, and for other purposes. There are several ways set out in the bill in which export trade is to be promoted. By section 2 the associations permitted to be organized under section 1 are exempted from the operation of a certain act. By section 3, as it is now amended, the same associations are exempted from the operation of another act. By section 4, and I call the attention of the Chair to this particularly, a penal section is inserted in the bill; that is, the prohibition against unfair methods of competition contained in the Federal Trade Commission act is expressly extended to acts of the same kind if committed in a foreign country between American corporations.

Now this amendment seeks to encourage export trade by providing that all export trade shall be treated alike, and that any steamship or express company or common carrier that discriminates against any shipper from the United States shall be punished in a particular way. What is the use of passing a bill to promote export trade if under existing practices the ships that go out of the port of New York to South America can say that they will take A's goods and refuse B's goods? That does not influence for the good of export trade or, to use the language of the caption, that does not promote export trade. That prohibits export trade unless it is an export trade of such combinations as the one I mentioned this afternoon, of W. R. Grace & Co., the American Fruit Co., and the English firm I mentioned, and the Latin-American Co.

If you are going to promote export trade, put in a provision that would prevent discrimination; and a provision against discrimination is absolutely germane to this bill when you take into consideration not only sections 1, 2, and 3, but also section 4, that deals specifically with unfair methods of trade, and likewise section 5, which is a penal provision, and provides for excluding certain associations from the benefits of this act that do not file the reports asked for.

The test of the germaneness of an amendment is whether it seeks to further in some method—not necessarily the method of the bill—the general purpose of the bill. Now the general purpose of the bill, as the title indicates, is to promote export trade, and a provision that prevents discrimination against shippers certainly tends to promote export trade.

The point of order is not good, the amendment is in order; and I would be very glad, if the Chair so rules, to discuss the reason why I think the committee should adopt it.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, the bill under consideration deals with associations engaged exclusively in the export trade. The amendment that the gentleman offers deals with common carriers in trade across the ocean—an entirely new subject. And it deals with it in an entirely new way.

It is in relation to the export trade, but clearly everything that might be in connection with the export trade would not be germane to this bill. We have in other bills a provision to cover the same practice that the gentleman refers to. We have in the shipping bill, and we also have a provision as to that in the revenue bill. I do not think the legislation proposed by the gentleman in his amendment is germane to the bill.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, that goes to the question as to whether the legislation is necessary, not as to whether it is in order.

But the gentleman's own argument demonstrates that it is germane. As I understand it, he practically concedes that a bill aimed to prevent discrimination among importers might tend to promote the export trade. All of the sections do not relate to associations. Section 4 does not relate to associations.

Mr. WEBB. It extends the powers of the Federal Trade Commission act to those associations.

Mr. BENNET. No; Mr. Chairman, curiously enough, that is the one section of the bill that does not mention associations at all. It simply says that the prohibition against unfair methods of competition, and the remedies, and so forth, shall be construed as extending to unfair methods of competition in the export trade—against competitors in the export trade.

Under that section, and very properly, if a few corporations not choosing to use the association methods should go down to Costa Rica and engage in business down there and should do things which they would not be permitted to do in the United States under the Federal Trade Commission act, being American corporations, they would come under the provisions of the Federal Trade Commission act. That section is to meet the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of the American Banana Co. against the United Fruit Co. It does not mention associations. So we have a section that does not mention associations; that relates to other corporations; and it is a penal section.

The amendment I offer is limited to commerce, and limited to foreign commerce; and therefore it affects the export trade, and, in fact, is limited to the export trade, because it relates only to goods going out of the United States. The gentleman from North Carolina himself concedes that the prevention of discriminations would tend to promote the export trade.

The CHAIRMAN. The bill is a bill to promote export trade, and the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET], it seems to the Chair, is for the purpose of preventing discriminations in the export trade. The Chair holds that the amendment is germane, and overrules the point of order. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. BENNET. Now, Mr. Chairman, I would like to discuss the merits of the amendment.

The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] called attention to the fact that in the shipping bill we inserted an amendment aimed at this same evil, and the gentleman was entirely correct. But the trouble with that amendment is that, drawn hastily as it was, although by a good and skillful lawyer, it is probably unconstitutional. We have no right to delegate our legislative powers, and the draftsman of this section 36 of the shipping bill for some reason or other failed to direct the Secretary of the Treasury to apply the laws equally in all cases.

As the amendment passed the Senate and then the House, and as it has now gone to the President, it simply authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to refuse a clearance to any vessel in certain cases. In other words, we attempt to confer—unless the word "authorize" is construed to be equivalent to "directed," which I think would be a strained construction—we attempt to delegate our legislative power to the Secretary of the Treasury. That makes the section unconstitutional.

Now, this provision is a simple provision, easily enforceable, which takes the same situation and facts into account which were attempted to be covered in the shipping bill, and says that a discrimination against an American exporter from an American port of American goods to another country shall be a crime. It has no minimum punishment. Therefore if the offense is slight the punishment can be slight. It has a maximum punishment. But if adopted it is the one thing that certainly will do away with this practice which to-day has destroyed the commerce between the United States and South America.

Why, gentlemen talk about the benefits of this bill. I am going to vote for the bill. I can see some benefits in it after the war is over. But unless you can do something that will benefit the export trade now, you are "sounding brass and tinkling cymbals." You are not benefiting the present generation. You are simply promoting the interest of foreign countries at war. Time and time again instances have been cited on the floor of the House of American manufacturers and exporters who simply can not send their goods to South America, because the Government of Great Britain has said that they shall not do business with those South American countries.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BENNET. I ask unanimous consent for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. I wanted to offer an amendment to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is entitled to two minutes.

Mr. BENNET. I doubt whether I shall use the entire two minutes. I simply conclude with the statement that the situation has gotten into such a condition that in order to enforce the Monroe doctrine, in which the South American Republics are as interested as we are, the Republic of Chile has asked the Republics of North and South America to join together for the purpose of resisting these blacklisting discriminations. Now, in the name of the leadership of America, if we intend hereafter to assert that we are the great dominant power in the American hemisphere, let us protect our own American commerce going from our own American ports. [Applause.]

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, however much in sympathy some gentlemen may be with the amendment of the gentleman from New York, I hope the committee will not adopt it, for several reasons. One is that you know it is a rather acute question in the House and Senate, and my opinion is that if you put this amendment on this bill it means practically the death of the bill, which we are trying to pass.

Mr. MANN. Did we not carry practically the same thing, though possibly in an unconstitutional form, on the shipping bill as a Senate amendment which we agreed to?

Mr. WEBB. I was going to say in addition to that my understanding is that the gentleman from New York has already offered this identical amendment at other times, and at one time on the shipping bill.

Mr. BENNET. The gentleman is entirely mistaken.

Mr. MANN. The Senate added an amendment to the shipping bill, which we accepted, which tended to cover this question.

Mr. WEBB. Yes; and declined to accept the amendment of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. MANN. They declined to accept the amendment of the gentleman from New York for parliamentary reasons, and I myself thought they were good reasons, not desiring to send the shipping bill back to the Senate. There is a question in reference to the shipping-bill amendment as to whether it is not an unconstitutional application of authority. Now, this accomplishes the same purpose that is intended to be accomplished by that amendment which was agreed to. I do not think anybody objected to it in either body, so I do not think it will hurt this bill. I say frankly to the gentleman that I will not vote for any amendment that I think injures this bill.

Mr. WEBB. I do not see the necessity for it if we have it already practically in the law. I do not see any use in repeating it.

Mr. BENNET. Because the provision in the shipping bill is unconstitutional.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BENNET) there were—ayes 16, noes 32.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. That every association now engaged solely in export trade, within 60 days after the passage of this act, and every association entered into hereafter for the sole purpose of engaging in export trade, within 30 days after its creation, shall file with the Federal Trade Commission a verified written statement setting forth the location of its offices or places of business and the names and addresses of all its officers and of all its stockholders or members, and if a corporation, a copy of its certificate or articles of incorporation and by-laws, and if unincorporated, a copy of its articles or contract of association, and on the 1st day of January of each year thereafter it shall make a like statement of the location of its offices or places of business and the names and addresses of all its officers and of all its stockholders or members and of all amendments to and changes in its articles or certificates of incorporation or in its articles or contracts of association and of all contracts, agreements, and understandings had with any foreign or domestic association in regard to the conduct of or practices in foreign trade. Any association which shall fail so to do shall not have the benefit of the provisions of section 2 and section 3 of this act, and it shall also forfeit to the United States the sum of $100 for each and every day of the continuance of such failure, which forfeiture shall be payable into the Treasury of the United States, and shall be recoverable in a civil suit in the name of the United States brought in the district where the association has its principal office, or in any district in which it shall do business. It shall be the duty of the various district attorneys, under the direction of the Attorney General of the United States, to prosecute for the recovery of the forfeiture. The costs and expenses of such prosecution shall be paid out of the appropriation for the expenses of the courts of the United States.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment as a new section.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. DILLON. I offer an amendment to perfect the original text. Does not my amendment come first?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Dakota is recognized for the purpose of offering an amendment to the text of the section.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. DILLON: Page 4, line 11, after the word "trade," insert "associations formed under the terms of this act shall be composed solely of citizens or corporations of the United States."

Mr. DILLON. Mr. Chairman, if I understand this section correctly, anybody can form these corporations or associations. It is not necessary that he be a citizen of the United States. It seems to me that this act should be confined to our own citizens or our own corporations.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, I am in sympathy with what the gentleman is trying to arrive at. I do not know exactly what he means by corporations in the United States. Does the gentleman mean incorporated in some State?

Mr. DILLON. Yes.

Mr. GARD. Then the gentleman had better make that clear, because his present amendment would refer, I think, to corporations only.

Mr. DILLON. Possibly it is subject to that criticism. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to modify the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Dakota asks unanimous consent to modify his amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Modified amendment by Mr. DILLON: Page 4, line 11, after the word "trade," insert "associations formed under the terms of this act shall be solely of citizens or corporations of some State of the United States."

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DILLON. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does the gentleman mean to exclude from the purposes of this act a selling corporation, for instance, in Buenos Aires, composed of five-sixths citizens of the United States and perhaps one citizen of Argentina. Can not the gentleman comprehend a situation of that kind where there was a selling agency with some foreigner a member of the association at the local situs?

Mr. BENNET. The law of the foreign country might declare that one director should be a citizen of that country.

Mr. DILLON. My thought was that these corporations ought to be composed of our own citizens or corporations. We ought not to go into a foreign country to get our incorporators to engage in our export business.

Mr. GARD. I think we are all in sympathy with what the gentleman wants. His idea is that this legislation shall be for the benefit of the American exporters. I think that the time is now at hand, the opportunity is here and may not come again, when American trade is to be extended in the proper channel in foreign countries, notably South America and the African country.

In the extension of our trade one of the principal things is that the American exporter must learn the foreign customs so that the proper credit may be given, so that he will understand the proper business conditions. In other words, the American exporter must go to school and learn the customs of the people with whom he deals. There is no better way of learning than to be associated with people of the country. The gentleman's amendment would have the effect—it would say that no association having for instance one person in it a native of Buenos Aires, or of some other South American country, could come within the provisions of this act. It would go so far as to say that anybody who held stock in a corporation, one or two shares of which were held by a citizen of a South American country, could not operate under the provisions of this act. I think that that is certainly what the gentleman does not desire to do, at least it is not what he should want to do.

Mr. BENNET. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARD. Yes.

Mr. BENNET. Would it be possible to agree on an amendment limiting the privileges of this bill to such corporations as had at least 60 per cent of American ownership?

Mr. GARD. I think the gentleman can see that we can not go nearly to the length advocated by the gentleman from South Dakota.

Mr. BENNET. I agree to that.

Mr. GARD. I do not know as the gentleman desires to offer any such amendment, but I seriously say that this legislation ought not to go to the limit authorized by the amendment of the gentleman from South Dakota, and I hope it will not prevail.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Dakota.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by striking out, line 20, page 3, the words "for the sole purpose of engaging," and insert in lieu thereof the words "which engage solely."

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I think one expression means the same thing as the other, and I accept the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I now offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add at the end of the bill a new section, numbered 6, as follows: "SEC. 6. That the President be, and he hereby is, empowered and authorized to place an embargo on munitions of war and all other, and any such, articles of export as he may deem proper that are destined for any foreign country that now or hereafter knowingly disregards international law and violates the neutrality rights that are in existence between United States and any foreign nation."

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order, so that the gentleman may speak to his amendment.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I am in complete harmony with that amendment. I will say that the amendment was prepared by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. McLEMORE], but this amendment should be adopted. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] says he is going to raise the point of order against it. It seems to me that the point of order can not be sustained against this amendment for the reason that it is for the purpose of promoting trade with foreign countries. At this time if we had such a law and the President would act as he would be empowered to act by the amendment we probably would not be subject to the rule of the King of England as we are at the present time in the way of putting prohibitions on shipments of the manufactured products of this country.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, many may entirely agree with the sentiments expressed in the gentleman's amendment, but I think it is not germane and would tend, probably, to kill this bill, and therefore I shall have to insist on the point of order.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Does not the gentleman agree this would tend to promote the export trade, especially at the present time, and is it not in harmony with the bill that will be effective now——

Mr. WEBB. But some might think it would restrict our export trade.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. For instance, the blacklist on some of our American manufactures.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill and amendments to the House, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. RUBEY, chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 17350), and had directed him to report the bill to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendments to final passage.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina moves the previous question on the bill and amendments to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

By unanimous consent, Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania was granted leave to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, the papers in the case of Augustus Boyd, Fifty-third Congress, H. R. 3753, no adverse report having been made thereon; also the papers in the case for the relief of Augustus Boyd, Fifty-fourth Congress, H. The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is, in fact, before the Senate, and the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] has been recognized.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will lie over until to-morrow under the rule.

EQUAL SUFFRAGE.

Mr. PITTMAN. I have a telegram and letter here with regard to equal suffrage which I ask may be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Such will be the order, unless there is objection.

The telegram and letter are as follows:

CHICAGO, ILL., August 31, 1916.

Senator KEY PITTMAN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

As chairman of the National Woman's Party and legislative chairman of the Congressional Union, I earnestly ask you and all other Democratic Senators to urge President Wilson, as leader of the Democratic Party, responsible for legislation in Congress, to secure a favorable vote on the Susan B. Anthony amendment, as he did on the child-labor bill, and ask you to have this telegram read into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, as you know we have long been ready for a vote at any time, provided the President and the Democratic majority in Congress will support the amendment, as they are the only power in the country which can secure its submission. A premature vote without this support would only mean defeat, which is, as you know, why we urged delay in the Senate in June. The adjournment of Congress without passing the amendment will constitute a record of hostility to the political freedom of American women on the part of the party in power.

ANNE MARTIN,
Chairman National Woman's Party.

RENO, NEV., August 25, 1916.

Miss MINNIE FLANIGAN,
Acting President Nevada Women's Civic League,
Reno, Nev.

DEAR MISS FLANIGAN: We herewith tender our resignations as members of the Nevada Women's Civic League and also as members of its executive board.

The affiliation of the league with the woman's party is, to our minds, a subversion of the purposes for which the league was organized and it is directly in conflict with the plain provisions of the league's constitution.

Section 2 of the constitution provides: "The organization shall be nonpartisan in its relation to all political parties."

Section 10 provides that amendments to the constitution may only be made by a two-thirds vote, after a notice of the proposed change shall have been sent to every club in the league for at least a month prior to any action upon the proposed amendment.

In spite of the provisions of section 10, and without any notice whatever to any club in the league, the executive board has undertaken to make the league a branch of a partisan movement, having for its object the defeat of the Democratic candidates and the success of the Republican ticket at the coming election. If this is not a partisan movement, it is difficult to imagine one that would be more partisan, and the injustice of it is easily discernible by a moment's reflection.

The Republican and Democratic platforms declared for equal suffrage in almost identical terms, but neither party declared in favor of the Federal amendment. Notwithstanding this, the woman's party is making every effort within its power to help one party at the expense of the other.

The indorsement of the amendment by Mr. Hughes can not, and does not, bind his party in any way, nor does it alter or modify his party platform. Mr. Hughes himself frankly concedes this. In his speech to the woman's party at Reno on the occasion of his visit here he said:

"The Republican platform did not refer to the Federal amendment, and in my address in response to the notification of my nomination I did not refer to it. I could not add it to the platform of my party; that I had no right to do; that I had no right to attempt."

So that, regardless of Mr. Hughes's personal views, his party platform remains unaltered and he can neither change it nor attempt to change it.

If Mr. Hughes is to receive the support of the woman's party because of his personal views, then Mr. Wilson's personal views should also be considered.

Mr. Hughes never supported equal suffrage until he became a candidate for President. He has never voted for it, although he had the opportunity to do so. He has said that he can neither change nor attempt to change, the position of his party platform as to the Federal amendment.

Mr. Wilson not only favors equal suffrage, but he voted for it when he had the opportunity to do so. Yet Mr. Wilson is to be opposed because he does not do the very thing which Mr. Hughes admits he himself can not do.

In New York Mr. Hughes did not vote for suffrage.

In New Jersey Mr. Wilson did vote for suffrage.

Opposition to Mr. Wilson will not be viewed with favor by those who place the suffrage cause itself above the employment of militant methods to obtain it.

If we correctly understand the purpose of the woman's party in Nevada, its position is even more vulnerable. It would oppose Mr. PITTMAN and Mr. Caine and favor Mr. Platt and Mr. ROBERTS.

Mr. PITTMAN has always favored equal suffrage. In 1910 he put in the platform of his party a declaration in its favor and he spoke in its favor throughout the State. During the suffrage campaign in Nevada Senator PITTMAN not only spoke for the suffrage amendment, but he voted for it. As a delegate to the St. Louis convention he again voted and spoke in favor of suffrage. In the Senate of the United States, on the 5th of August of this year, he announced his purpose to vote for the Federal amendment. Yet the woman's party announces its purpose to oppose Mr. PITTMAN'S reelection.

What is the record of Mr. Platt on the suffrage question? He had every opportunity to support suffrage, but during the time when it needed help in the campaign of 1914 he either opposed it or remained silent. He was a delegate to the Chicago convention, but its records show no effort by Mr. Platt to foster or support the Federal amendment. Upon what plea of justice can the women of Nevada oppose Senator PITTMAN and support Mr. Platt?

There are three senatorial candidates before the people of Nevada—Senator PITTMAN, Mr. Miller, and Mr. Platt. Senator PITTMAN and Mr. Miller have always been active and open in their support of suffrage, while Mr. Platt has neither been active nor open in its support. Nevertheless, the Woman's Party would support one who never helped us as against the two who always helped us.

Mr. Caine has always favored the cause of suffrage; Mr. ROBERTS, so far as his record is known, has never supported it; but the Woman's Party asks the defeat of Mr. Caine and the election of Mr. ROBERTS. Is this justice or fair dealing?

The women of Nevada were most intensely interested in suffrage during our campaign of 1914. In that campaign the suffrage cause was supported by Senator PITTMAN and Mr. Caine. It was not publicly supported by Mr. Platt or Mr. ROBERTS. The bitterest opponent of the suffrage cause was the Reno Evening Gazette, the leading Republican paper of the State. The most active supporter of suffrage was the Nevada State Journal, the leading Democratic paper of the State.

In the recent Democratic primaries Senator PITTMAN, actively for suffrage, was renominated. In the Republican primaries, Judge Norcross, one of the truest friends of suffrage, was defeated.

President Wilson, whom the Woman's Party would defeat, has accomplished two of the really great things for which all women stand. He has maintained peace in the midst of a world's conflagration and he has thrown the protection of legislation around the toiling children of the land. What mother can fail to call him blessed!

The present activities of the Woman's Party can never, under these conditions, receive our support, nor do we believe the cause of equal suffrage will ever be advanced by striking down its friends.

THE THREATENED RAILROAD STRIKE.

Mr. THOMPSON. I have an editorial which was printed in the Washington Post Saturday morning, entitled "Stopping the Strike." I ask that it may be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. SMOOT. I object.

Mr. THOMPSON. I send the article to the desk and ask that the Secretary may read it under Rule XI of the Senate. I do not understand that a single objection is good when it is moved under this rule that it be read. It is for the Senate to determine by a vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The paper does not properly come in the sense of that rule. The rule evidently has reference to petitions and memorials. The Senator will have an opportunity later to present it.

Mr. THOMPSON. Very well; but if it can not be printed without reading, I will offer some remarks on the subject and read it myself. In order to save time and to insure the early passage of the eight-hour law, I refrained from speaking on the question Saturday, and with the desire to save time I was in hopes that the article might be printed without reading, as it fairly expresses my views on the subject. I believe in the eight-hour workday. The good old rule of human conduct prescribing eight hours for work, eight hours for recreation, and eight hours for sleep has never been improved upon.

Several Senators addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair suggests that it would result in economizing time to afford a reasonable opportunity to Senators to present formal routine matters which will not lead to debate. If the Senator from Illinois will yield, such matters can be disposed of.

Mr. LEWIS. Very well.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills:

H. R. 6034. An act to make available a portion of the appropriation for the immigration station at Baltimore, Md., for such counters, booths, screens, railings, seats, banks, kitchen and laundry equipment, etc., as necessary in connection with said station; and

H. R. 17350. An act to promote export trade, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the House insists upon its amendment to the bill (S. 4268) to satisfy certain claims against the Government arising under the Navy Department, disagreed to by the Senate, agrees to the conference asked for by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. POU, Mr. DIES, and Mr. EDMOND managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message further announced that the House insists upon its amendment to the bill (S. 3646) to amend the act of February 11, 1915 (38 Stat. L., p. 807), providing for the opening of the Fort Assiniboine Military Reservation, disagreed to by the Senate, agrees to the conference asked for by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado, Mr. RAKER, and Mr. LENROOT managers at the conference on the part of the House.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

H. R. 6034. An act to make available a portion of the appropriation for the immigration station at Baltimore, Md., for such counters, booths, screens, railings, seats, bunks, kitchen and laundry equipment, etc., as necessary in connection with said station was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

H. R. 17350. An act to promote export trade, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I wish to present a protest against a provision in the revenue bill placing printing paper on the free list, signed by Phil G. Baltz, manager of the Rex Paper Co., of Kalamazoo, Mich.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The protest will be received and filed.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I should like to have it printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Such will be the order unless there is objection.

There being no objection, the protest was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

KALAMAZOO, MICH., August 24, 1916.

Senator WILLIAM ALDEN SMITH,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: We want to enter a vigorous protest against the action of the Senate Finance Committee in placing printing paper on the free list. So long as the war lasts this action will not affect us in the least, but with the termination of the war it will place us at the mercy of Europe and Canada. We, with our high wages and three tours, can not compete against the longer hours and cheap labor of Europe. Nor can we compete with the cheaper labor of Canada, together with her almost limitless supply of pulp wood and her vast amount of water power.

This action of the Senate will mean the beginning of the end of the paper-making industry in the United States. It will build up mills in Canada and ours will rot with the lack of profit. Why build up Canada to the detriment of the United States? Why make a target of the paper mills? We need protection and should not be discriminated against. We respectfully request your influence in defeating this measure and sincerely hope you will interest yourself in behalf of ourselves and the paper makers of your great State.

Yours, truly,

REX PAPER CO.,
PHIL G. BALTZ, Manager.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I also present a communication signed by a committee of gentlemen of the State of Michigan, calling attention to the situation in the State of Michigan in connection with the introduction of military instruction and recommending the military department of the State Agricultural School at Lansing as a suitable place for such instruction. They also recommended an appropriation of $5,000 in aid of a military school or camp of instruction at the Michigan State Agricultural College during the summer months. I ask that the communication be received and printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the communication was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

To the honorable the United States Senators and Members of the United States House of Representatives from Michigan, Washington, D. C.

MARCH 30, 1916.

GENTLEMEN: There has been brought to the attention of the undersigned a situation in the State of Michigan, in connection with the demand for military instruction, that in our judgment requires action by the Federal authorities.

There are in this State several thousand young men, many of them students or graduates of high schools and colleges, who are very anxious to avail themselves of attendance at a summer military school or instruction camp if such an institution could be provided within the State.

It has naturally been suggested that the military department of our State agricultural college at Lansing should inaugurate and conduct such a summer school or camp, with a suitable course of instruction in military science, sanitation, tactics, maneuver, and drill as would meet this laudable demand.

That institution has an ideal plant, with most of the necessary facilities for such an undertaking, and could carry on, at small expense, a summer school or camp for military instruction, which would accommodate one, or perhaps two thousand students, who at the end of a two or three months' course would be turned out fairly well grounded in the rudiments of military defense.

Moreover, it is believed that a sufficient number of senior students at the college, who will graduate in June and who will have had four years of military instruction, will be willing to remain during the summer as instructors and drill masters, and who, in connection with one or two extra officers detailed from the Regular Army in addition to the regular instructors of the college military department, will make up an adequate teaching force for such a summer school.

We are advised that the college and its authorities have contemplated and would gladly inaugurate and carry on such a summer military school during the coming summer months, except for the fact that the college has not the present means at its immediate disposal for this purpose.

The recent destruction by fire of one of the large department buildings at the college, which building must of necessity be immediately restored, an undertaking which will require all available current funds, deprives the governing board of the means for carrying on a military instruction camp during the coming summer and as the State legislature does not meet till next year the advantages now of such a school, when the demand and sentiment in favor of it are so strong and active, can not be secured unless the Federal authorities will extend moderate temporary assistance.

It has therefore been thought wise to lay the matter before our Representatives at Washington and to earnestly request their consideration of the propriety of an appeal to Congress for an immediate appropriation of, say, $5,000 in aid of a military school or camp, with suitable course of instruction, at the Michigan Agricultural College during the coming summer months.

It is believed that even the small assistance suggested will, with the facilities already at hand, be sufficient to secure this very desirable object.

The purpose being so patriotic and timely, we lay this matter before you in the hope and belief that you will give it the attention that its importance deserves.

Very respectfully,

A. J. DOHERTY.
W. H. WALLACE.
R. S. GRAHAM.
JASON WARDMAN.
I. RAY WATERBURY.
HENRY A. HAIGH.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I present resolutions adopted by the Press Assistants' Union No. 40, of Detroit, Mich., which I ask may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PRESS ASSISTANTS' UNION NO. 40,
Detroit, Mich.

Whereas there is at present pending before the United States Senate the immigration bill (H. R. 10384); and

Whereas we have been informed, through the columns of the daily newspapers and in various other ways, that this bill passed the House of Representatives by a vote of 307 ayes to 87 nays; and

Whereas the vote of these various Representatives voting in the affirmative undoubtedly reflects the sentiment of their constituents; and

Whereas by the vote of their Representatives an overwhelming majority of the people of these United States have expressed their approval of the bill; and

Whereas by their approval of this bill the people have declared themselves most emphatically opposed to the admission to our country of the ignorant, illiterate foreign laborer; and

Whereas in our own city of Detroit we have, it is estimated, more than 40,000 of these illiterate foreign laborers; and

Whereas it is a proven fact that a large number of these foreigners have no intention of becoming citizens; and

Whereas a condition of this kind can not be other than detrimental to the best interests of the community: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the membership of Press Assistants' Union No. 40, a subordinate local union of the International Printing Pressmen and Assistants' Union of North America, in regular meeting assembled, does hereby express its approval of the bill known as H. R. 10384; and be it further

Resolved, That we do petition our representatives in the Senate to exert every effort for the passage of this bill at the present session of Congress; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be forwarded to each of the two Senators from Michigan, Messrs. TOWNSEND and SMITH.

ELBERT K. ELLIS,
GEO. H. DECKER,
ALFRED M. JUDGE,
Committee.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I also desire to present a communication from the Michigan State Medical Society, transmitting resolutions adopted at the fifty-first annual convention of that society, held at Houghton, Mich., which I ask may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the communication was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MICHIGAN STATE MEDICAL SOCIETY,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY EDITOR,
Grand Rapids, Mich., August 24, 1916.

Senator WILLIAM ALDEN SMITH,
Washington, D. C.

HONORED SIR: The Michigan State Medical Society, the official medical organization of the State of Michigan, assembled in its fifty-first annual convention, at Houghton, on August 15, 16, and 17, unanimously adopted the following resolution and instructed me to send copies of same to you for your information:

"Whereas military exercises in early life favor a high degree of mental and physical development, through quickening perception, improving organic functions, and developing muscular and bony structures; and

"Whereas marching under the flag of the country, the symbol of governmental authority, inculcates obedience, encourages loyalty, and furnishes discipline in self-control. Therefore be it

"Resolved, That the Michigan State Medical Society recommend universal military training, and requests the Michigan congressional delegation to exert itself to bring about effective legislation to this end.

"Resolved, That copies of these resolutions be furnished by the secretary to every Member of the House of Representatives and Senate of the United States and to the various leagues and organizations interested in the propaganda for national defense."

Yours, very truly.

F. C. WARNSHUIS, Secretary Editor.

Mr. POMERENE. I present a large number of petitions from citizens of my State and ask that the body of one of the petitions be incorporated in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Such will be the order, unless there is objection.

There being no objection, the petitions were referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce, and the body of one was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AN APPEAL OF THE 80 PER CENT.

We, the undersigned citizens of the State of Ohio, and among those comprising the more than 80 per cent of the employees of the railways of our State and country, being confronted with the possibility of an entire paralyzation of the railways of the country by the proposed general strike of the four orders of trainmen, a group of less than 20 per cent of the entire number of railway employees, and the consequent curtailment of income to us, the more than 80 per cent, to whom such a curtailment would be ruinous, and fully realizing that under this great Government where the ruling doctrine is "the greatest good to the greatest number," we, the large majority, more than 80 per cent of the people to be directly injured by such a destructive method of the few who happen to be placed in a position where they can use them, have a clear and definite rigat to be protected (the general public and all other industries seriously endangered also having that right), do earnestly petition you, our Senators and Representatives, individually and as the Congress of the Nation, and pray that some definite legislative action be taken whereby the vast majority of the people of the country shall be protected from a destructive interruption of interstate commerce due to wholly selfish action of a small group of men, and that all differences which may arise between railway and employee shall be settled by proper arbitration. In this way you would recognize the fundamental principle of the Republic, that no small group of men ought to be permitted, directly or indirectly, to conspire to an end calculated to benefit them only, and directly or indirectly work wrong and loss upon the great majority.

Mr. PHELAN presented a petition of the Chamber of Commerce of Los Angeles, Cal., praying for the establishment of an aircraft base and training school at North Island, San Diego, Cal., which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. MYERS presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Missoula, Mont., remonstrating against the enactment of legislation for compulsory Sunday observance in the District of Columbia, which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. OLIVER presented a petition of the Pennsylvania Pharmaceutical Association, praying for the adoption of certain amendments to the patent laws, which was referred to the Committee on Patents.

FEDERAL FARM-LOAN ACT.

Mr. FLETCHER. I desire to submit a favorable report from the Committee on Printing.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. We are under a unanimous-consent agreement for the reception of formal matters.

Mr. FLETCHER. It is a favorable report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be received and filed.

Mr. FLETCHER. I ask unanimous consent for its consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read.

The resolution (S. Res. 262) was read, as follows:

Resolved, That there be printed 65,000 copies of public act No. 158, Sixty-fourth Congress, first session, entitled "The Federal farm-loan act," for the use of the Senate document room.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the resolution reported by the Senator from Florida?

Mr. SMOOT. I will ask the Senator what is the cost?

Mr. FLETCHER. The estimated cost is $494.63.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS—JOHN T. PEET.

On motion of Mr. CURTIS, it was Ordered, That the papers accompanying the bill S. 2930, Sixty-fourth Congress, first session, and previous Congresses, granting a pension to John T. Peet, be withdrawn from the files of the Senate, no adverse report having been made thereon.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT AUGUSTA, GA.

Mr. HARDWICK. The House passed on Saturday the bill (S. 5407) authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Treasury to extend the time of payment of the amount due the Government by the city of Augusta, Ga., with an amendment. I should like to call it up for the purpose of agreeing to the House amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 5407) authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Treasury to extend the time of payment of the amount due the Government by the city of Augusta, Ga., which was, on page 1, lines 10 and 11, to strike out "without interest" and insert "with interest from the date of the passage of this act at the rate of 4 per cent per annum."

Mr. HARDWICK. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House.

Mr. SMOOT. From the reading of the amendment I could not discover whether it is a claim against the Government of the United States or whether it is a judgment.

Mr. HARDWICK. No; if the Senator wants me to explain it, the Government of the United States sold the old post-office building to the city of Augusta. This is a proposition to extend the time fixed for the payment of that public building by the city on account of the very disastrous flood which occurred in Augusta. We have already passed the bill through the Senate extending the time for the payment of the money due the Government for the property sold to the municipality.

Mr. SMOOT. Will the Government of the United States be compelled to pay interest under this provision?

Mr. HARDWICK. No; the Government of the United States will get interest at the rate of 4 per cent from the city of Augusta.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the amendment of the House of Representatives.

The amendment was concurred in.

PRAYERS OF CHAPLAIN OF THE HOUSE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution (No. 28) of the House of Representatives, which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there be printed as a House document for the use of the House of Representatives, to be distributed through the folding room, 55,000 copies of the prayers offered at the opening of the morning sessions of the Sixty-third Congress of the United States by the Chaplain, Henry M. Couden, the same to be compiled by the Chaplain, who shall have 100 copies for his use.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. POMERENE. Without intending in any way to displace the unfinished business——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] has the floor. It depends on the good nature which he has already shown, if the Senator from Ohio proposes to take up anything. The Chair simply calls attention to that fact.

Mr. POMERENE. Very well; I will not proffer the request now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Are there other formal matters that Senators desire to dispose of?

LEVI COOKE—TAX ON WINES AND CORDIALS.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, on August 30, 1916, the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN], while the wine provisions of the pending revenue bill were under consideration, presented and had printed in the RECORD, at page 13377, an affidavit made by Mr. Hilliard E. Welch of Lodi, Cal. At the time of presenting it the Senator from California commented upon the matter at some length. The affidavit related to an attorney here in Washington—Mr. Levi Cooke.

I have no interest in Mr. Welch or Mr. Cooke, but the affidavit was inserted at a rather early hour, I presume with the intention of influencing the judgment of Congress with respect to the matters covered by the affidavit. These same matters will be made the subject of conference.

Mr. President, I have received from Mr. Cooke an affidavit, quite specific in its terms, contradictory of the affidavit presented by the Senator from California. I ask that that also may be inserted in the RECORD, in order that both these statements, for whatever they may be worth, may be accessible to the Senate and to the committee of conference.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Such will be the order, unless there is objection. The Chair hears none.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Levi Cooke, being duly sworn, deposes and says as follows:

"That he has read the statements sworn to by Hilliard E. Welch and F. Albertz, read in the Senate of the United States on August 30, by Senator PHELAN, and reported at page 13377 of the RECORD;

"That the statement made by said Welch, and indorsed by said Albertz, is false and misleading, and that the following is a true statement of meetings held between said Welch and Alberts and affiant:

"The affiant, Levi Cooke, is general counsel for the National Wholesale Liquor Dealers Association, which is composed of about 800 members, said members being corporations, firms, and individuals engaged in distilling, manufacturing, and distributing distilled spirts and liquors. A number of members are engaged exclusively in the wine business, and a large number are engaged in manufacturing cordials and liqueurs.

"Affiant, in behalf of the cordial manufacturers, appeared before a subcommittee of the Senate Finance Committee on July 21, 1916, accompanied by the Secretary of the American Association of Cordial Manufacturers, and made an oral argument and filed briefs (see hearings, p. 63, et seq.), urging the following:

"1. That the cordial tax of 24 cents per gallon on cordials be eliminated so far as it covered cordials made with tax-paid distilled spirits, as the effect of such tax would be to make the ordinary gallon of distilled-spirit base cordial, 40 per cent proof, pay 68 cents per gallon tax money, whereas the same alcoholic strength cordial would be made from fortified wine, and pay tax of only 36 cents.

"2. That unless distilled-spirit base cordials were so treated, cheaply taxed fortified wine would displace tax-paid spirits in cordial manufacture to the injury of the revenue, and the injury of the cordial trade.

"3. That fortified wine had been excluded from cordial making by law for many years, in order that the distilled-spirit revenue be protected; and that if now such wines were to be admitted to cordial manufacture, an equalizing tax on them could well be charged, but no supertax should be levied on distilled-spirit base cordials, the effect of which would be to tax distilled-spirit cordials out of existence in favor of the more cheaply taxed wine base.

"Affiant states that on August 1 he was requested by the president of the National Wholesale Liquor Dealers' Association to comply with a request received by the latter from California to meet the said Hilliard E. Welch, that he telephoned said Welch, and the latter came to affiant's office. Said Welch stated that the brief filed by the cordial manufacturers had injured the prospects of the wine bill as he and Congressman KENT had advocated its form; that affiant was absolutely right in the position taken regarding the effect of the cordial tax in forcing the use of cheaply taxed fortified wine in place of tax-paid distilled spirits, and that he himself opposed the provision, but that interests in California demanded the same. Affiant suggested that said Welch state his views regarding the cordial tax to the Senators on the Finance Committee, but this said Welch declined to do.

"Affiant told said Welch that he, affiant, felt it his duty to argue at all times for the safeguarding of the full Government revenue at $1.10 per proof gallon on distilled spirits; that he could not, aside from the interest of cordial manufacturers, accede to a form of tax which would substitutte in any branch of the liquor business cheaply-taxed distilled spirits in place of the regularly taxed article; that the pending bill was a revenue bill and should not be made the vehicle of displacing full-taxed liquors with so-called fortified wines which were half the alcoholic strength of whisky, rum, and brandy, which could be turned into cordials and liqueurs.

"Said Welch asked affiant to withdraw his brief, not, he said, because it was unsound in fact, but because California interests would resent any interference with their bill; that there was a prohibition campaign in California, and if the interests there were dissatisfied it might have an injurious effect on the prohibition question. Affiant informed said Welch that he could not and would not withdraw said brief: that the cordial manufacturers were entitled to be heard and could not be deprived of rights or denied principles which said Welch himself conceded to exist, merely because California interests demanded their surrender in the interest of legislation intended solely for the tax benefit of said California interests; that affiant did not doubt that the cordial manufacturers in a perfectly proper way were interested in the California prohibition question, but under threats on that score could not be asked to abandon their own interest and join in a movement to deplete the Federal revenues.

"Said Welch returned the following day with said Albertz, and the entire subject was rediscussed.

"George R. Beneman, affiant's assistant, was present.

"Said Welch proposed that the bill should be amended to permit withdrawal of wines tax free to manufacture cordials, but affiant said this was impossible, as it meant only further depletion of the revenue by increasing the tax necessity of substituting wines for tax-paid distilled spirits in making alcoholic liquors of the cordial variety. Said Welch reiterated his demand that affiant withdraw his brief in behalf of the cordial manufacturers, declaring that it had endangered the wine schedule he and said Albertz were advocating, and stated that if the bill failed he himself would take the stump in California to advocate State-wide prohibition; and that unless affiant's clients liked that prospect, affiant should assist said Welch by withdrawing all objection to the cordial tax as drafted. Affiant stated that his clients of course did not wish to see the State of California vote for prohibition; that said clients were indifferent on the subject of taxes upon table wines for beverage use, as such, but that affiant himself, aside from the views of his clients, would oppose with all vigor any measure designed to substitute cheaply-taxed fortified wines, half the strength of whisky, rum, and brandy, for tax-paid distilled spirits in cordials and other liquors entirely distinct from table wines. Affiant clearly stated that no compulsion of any kind could force him to abandon fundamental principles of revenue underlying the Federal taxation of liquors. And thus the meeting ended.

"Said Welch's affidavit is entirely false in the last paragraph thereof. Affiant made no reference to Senator THOMAS or any other Senator except to suggest that said Welch stated to Senators, as he had to affiant, that affiant's argument on the cordial tax was sound in fact; and affiant made no reference to contributions in connection with any antiprohibition propaganda except to say that doubtless the very cordial manufacturers whose interest was to be sacrificed in favor of the California interest in the latter's wine schedule were helping in a legitimate way to assist the very people said Welch was representing in their antiprohibition propaganda in California. Affiant made no statement of alternative intentions to said Welch either on his own account or on that of his clients, and the statement of said Welch in the last paragraph of his affidavit has no basis whatever in fact. Affiant's sole suggestion to said Welch was that the latter, as matter of justice and fair dealing, tell the Senators what he had told affiant regarding the facts of the cordial tax.

"Said Welch and those whom he represented made further efforts to prevail on affiant to withdraw his brief on the cordial tax, but affiant has continued to refuse and has stood flatly against any supertax on distilled spirit cordials, with consequent tax advantage in favor of making cordials with more cheaply taxed wine bases and consequent reduction of revenue from the alcohol present in cordials, liqueurs, and similar compounds.

DIVISION OF CIVIC TRAINING.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I have a matter which I should like to bring up, which will take but a minute.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. LEWIS. If the matter which the Senator from Massachusetts desires to present does not require observations, I will yield.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I will yield to the Senator merely to present a document.

Mr. WEEKS. For my colleague, I desire to have printed as a public document a statement by Wilson L. Gill in favor of the establishment of a division of civic training in the Bureau of Education. It will be satisfactory to me to have the document referred to the Committee on Printing for action if so desired.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Such will be the order, unless there is objection. The Chair hears none.

THE PRESIDENT AND STRIKE LEGISLATION.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I desire to address the Senate for a few moments upon a matter not relating to the revenue bill.

Mr. President, from the morning papers I read the report that at St. Louis, in the State of Missouri, the Hon. Charles Evans Hughes, the candidate of the Republican Party for the presidency, in a noonday address before what are termed "the business men"—the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] designates them as "the Business Men's League"—called specific attention to the fact that in affairs of government we should neither surrender principle to force nor adopt force to enforce a principle; that, wherever possible, conciliation and arbitration should be resorted to where the principle may be secured by that method. In this assertion of the eminent candidate of the Republican Party he was correct. These remarks of the eminent candidate were addressed at that time to that body of men who, it was understood, were of the number who were planning revenge upon President Wilson for having yielded to the force of circumstances and refused to arbitrate the principle of an eight-hour day.

Mr. President, I invite the attention of this Chamber to the fact that this is the distinguished gentleman who, obeying the directions of his master spirit, Theodore Roosevelt, denounced in the city of Chicago and in the city of Detroit Woodrow Wilson and the Democratic Party because of the adoption of the theory of arbitration and the principle of conciliation to bring about peace between ourselves and a foreign country and to cement anew the loyalty of our German-American citizens. I call your attention that where the hatreds of the Germans may be aroused and the old bitternesses revived, that might serve for party political uses; that then it is a crime on the part of Wilson and the Democracy to have adopted the method of conciliation and arbitration to bring about peace, and that, too, notwithstanding the bountiful blessings secured as a result; but where there is a possibility of awakening the enmity and the combined opposition of the financial masters and the railroad magnates by assailing the policy of arbitration and conciliation, then, sir, the method of force against force is denounced, and the theory of arbitration and conciliation is preached as the only doctrine applicable to a just and free republic!

Mr. President, I could not overlook this morning in the public press this peculiar inconsistency by which this eminent candidate presents himself as being for peace or force, depending on what he feels may be the desire or temper of the particular audience before which he stands. Indeed, sir, the Scripture is literally fulfilled in his declaration—"all things to all men"; and I may add, and anything to anybody for votes anywhere.

Mr. President, the strike which hung like an impending disaster over this Government is averted. There is no turbulence or bloodshed; there are no deaths in riots. The business of the country is not paralyzed; commerce is not stifled. The affairs of men have not been hindered; there has been no hunger of children; there are no famished women. There is no chaos in overturned and choked affairs of our Nation. Our people are, as they have been, enjoying still the inheritance of peace and prosperity through the sagacious statesmanship and diplomacy of Woodrow Wilson, the President of the United States.

Mr. President, I wish now to refer to the observations heralded in half a dozen eminent papers of our country this morning. These seek to make comparison between what they claim was the method of settling strikes of Theodore Roosevelt and that of Grover Cleveland with that of Woodrow Wilson. These exclaim, "Oh, that it were Grover Cleveland or Theodore Roosevelt in the White House." Senators, how easy it is for the mind to forget the events of the past. How inclined we are to praise that which has gone if we can find in it a thing with which we might conjure to the prejudice of the thing of the present. There are Senators who do me the compliment to sit here this morning who, on this floor, denounced both the method adopted by Grover Cleveland and that of Theodore Roosevelt, and, sirs, let us recall in what respect? We reply that it must now be recalled that President Roosevelt dallied for five months at the flat of the coal barons of America, and refused and shrank, as I assert, from introducing the power of this Government in any form whatever into that then pending conflict. Five months elapsed; the arteries of trade were literally tied up. The furnaces of the mills and the foundries died out. Factories were hushed, foundries ceased, business was stilled, thousands of toilers stood upon the streets, hundreds were mobbed on the corners, women were murdered, children died in hunger, thousands froze for want of fuel, and millions shivered in chilling cold, and there stood before this country such an appalling disaster that great public opinion arose, as with a form impossible to oppose, and demanded intercession by the Federal Government. Then, and not until then, did President Roosevelt intercede by the arm and power of the Federal Government to avert the calamity which all suffered and which all mankind beheld with dismay, as it settled upon this Nation, with loss to men and danger to the Republic.

Then, sir, under Cleveland, Senators will recall how President Cleveland, for reasons of his own, hesitated, debated, and floundered as to whether he would go with his force or stay, whether he would advance or retreat, whether he would assume to exercise the power of the Federal Government or decline. Then, sir, the assumption of those who indulge in lawlessness to accomplish their purposes grew and multiplied. Throughout this country the railroads were stifled, freight cars blocked, roundhouses choked, the cities filled with distress, the product of the farms rotting in bins, warehouses, and in elevators. Then in the cities, particularly in the imperial city of my home, Chicago, riots broke forth, blood bespattered the sidewalk, anarchy red-handed struck civilization a blow, law and order were paralyzed in the Republic of America; and before the world we stood an object of pity upon the part of the friends and contempt on the part of the enemies of republican form of government. Sir, such a chasm widened out in the land where I lived and class hatred was so accentuated, as the result of this prolonged conflict and from the reign of lawlessness and disorder, that there was formed the now Socialist Party of America as a protest against any form of competition in the industrial affairs of mankind. To this hour we are suffering from the wounds inflicted at that time; and this very strike which was threatened upon this country, the disaster of which was so correctly depicted by eminent and eloquent Senators on this floor, was the child, the birth of that very hesitant policy and that long-delayed course on the part of those who should have acted with promptitude at a time when all these results I have described could have been averted.

Now, Mr. President, I ask my fellow countrymen, as I ask you, my distinguished colleagues, Where is that man who would choose the vacillating and hesitating policy of President Roosevelt or of President Cleveland, which brought upon the country the disasters to which I allude, with all the train of destruction, of riot, lawlessness, and bloodshed, to that of Woodrow Wilson, which, in its promptness and through the force of conciliation, by the agency of the lawmaking body, has produced the result which we now enjoy? Sir, in this Nation now nothing was stopped, nothing paralyzed, no crisis in the Republic, all peace, all prosperity, not even an infant, not a baby, inconvenienced by hunger. We realize that this has been the result of that great promptness of course, that sagacity and statesmanship on the part of the head of our Government, aided by the legislators who came to his support in the moment of his demand.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHAFROTH in the chair). Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. LEWIS. Gladly, sir.

Mr. GALLINGER. I remember, Mr. President, that during the Civil War some distinguished gentlemen in the South said that all they wanted was to be let alone; and if they had been let alone a great deal of bloodshed and a great deal of suffering and sorrow and death would have been averted. But the Government did not think it was wise to let them alone.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I recognize that there were those who at that time said, "We need only be let alone," and there were those who felt it was wise to let them alone. I also note in the public press that the eminent leader of the Republican Party, who is now sponsoring its presidential candidate, the Hon. Theodore Roosevelt, is condemning the Democracy wherever he can for not making war on Germany; and, among other reasons he gives is that in the time of the Civil War Horace Greeley, the then eminent editor and voice of the Republican Party, referring to the situation to which the eminent Senator from New Hampshire now adverts, cried out, "Let the erring sisters go in peace." Col. Roosevelt says that there were those in the Government at that time with a disposition to obey the demand, and he likens our situation in not making war on Germany to that policy—that we are willing to let "erring Germany" go. My learned friend, the eminent Senator from New Hampshire, is right in his observations. The Government could not let some things alone then or now. The same stimulus that prevented disorder as best it could, or rather the policy and decision of staying rebellion, avoiding secession, and continuing the Union, is the same policy that is in the hearts of our brothers to-day by which we seek peace, hope to avoid conflict, and dream to perpetuate prosperity and happiness.

Therefore, Mr. President, I say gladly we are here to-day enjoying the ordination of the Holy Scriptures when we recall that the great Master proclaimed the truth that "By their fruits ye shall know them." To-day, this morning, Monday, upon the day when this holocaust and disaster was threatened to have fallen upon us, we point our countrymen to the fruits of our planting and cry unto them to behold them, they are peace, comfort, blessings, and happiness. Sirs, from this we feel in our hearts that the Great Gleaner will say unto his faithful steward as was said in a past sacred day to another, "Ye have planted wisely, and unto my people ye have brought forth good fruit."

THE REVENUE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 16763) to increase the revenue, and for other purposes.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, the Senate now has under consideration a very important measure. It is the anxious desire of the vast majority of Senators on both sides of the Chamber to dispose of that measure as quickly as possible and bring about an adjournment within a few days. The only way in which that can be accomplished is by the Senate and Senators devoting their attention exclusively to the measure that is before the Senate.

I now wish to give notice that if any more of the time now remaining to us is going to be devoted to political speeches, or to anything else than the business in hand, I will call for a quorum every time it happens. I believe that the leaders on the other side of the Chamber are just as anxious to get away as the rank and file on this side, and we will cooperate with them in every effort to expedite action on the revenue bill; but if any attempt is made to interfere with it, they will have to produce a quorum every moment of the time.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I am glad that the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER] has called the attention of the Senate to the fact that there is pending a very important measure, in which the country is deeply interested, and which we are all anxious to dispose of as quickly as possible. I thought probably we would facilitate its consideration if we allowed some little opportunity this morning for Senators to present certain reports and things of that kind that they felt it was their duty to have go in the RECORD, and I did not raise the point of order against them; but I feel that it is necessary now to insist that nothing shall be injected which shall interfere with the consideration of this bill. I hope Senators on this side and Senators on the other side will refrain from making political speeches, or speeches not germane to the bill, until we have finished it. I heartily join the Senator from Pennsylvania in his suggestion, and I assure that side of the Chamber that so far as I am concerned I will cooperate to keep the Senate to the consideration of this bill to the exclusion of other matters.

I want it distinctly understood, of course, that I am not criticizing the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS]. I hope we will not have any further discussions of a political character or not germane to this bill.

LEGISLATIVE RECORD OF THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I intend to make some remarks reviewing the legislative record of the Democratic Party. Part of what I shall say relates directly to this legislation, and, inasmuch as I am anxious to get through as soon as possible, I shall not yield to any interruptions, for two reasons: First, I do not want the continuity of my remarks broken into; in the next place, my experience with interruptions is that it keeps a man on his feet a much longer time than he would otherwise have to stay.

Owing to dissensions in the ranks of the Republican Party and to the fact that it had two candidates in the field, Woodrow Wilson, in the fall of 1912, by a plurality, but a minority of the popular vote, secured a majority of the Electoral College, and was thus chosen President of the United States, and was duly inaugurated March 4, 1913. Within a few days thereafter he convened Congress in extra session. Congress met on the 7th of April, 1913. The President, in pursuance of a custom he adopted, and which had not prevailed since the days of Washington, delivered on the following day his message orally to the two Houses of Congress in joint session. In his message he said, among other things:

> I have called the Congress together in extraordinary session because a duty was laid upon the party now in power at the recent elections which it ought to perform promptly, in order that the burden carried by the people under existing law may be lightened as soon as possible and in order also that the business interests of the country may not be kept too long in suspense as to what fiscal changes are to be, to which they will be required to adjust themselves. It is clear to the whole country that the tariff duties must be altered.
> The sooner that is done the sooner we shall escape from suffering from the facts and the sooner our men of business will be free to thrive by the law of nature (the nature of free business) instead of by the law of legislation and artificial arrangement.
>
> We must abolish everything that bears even the semblage of privilege or of any kind of artificial advantage and put our business men and producers under the stimulation of a constant necessity to be efficient, economical, and enterprising, masters of competitive supremacy, better workers and merchants than any in the world. Aside from the duties laid upon articles which we do not and probably can not produce, there fore, and the duties laid upon luxuries and merely for the sake of the revenues they yield, the object of the tariff duties henceforth laid must be effective competition, the whetting of American wits by contest with the wits of the rest of the world.

In pursuance of this Executive mandate Congress, both Houses being in control of the Democratic Party, proceeded to formulate and enact a new tariff act, which finally became a law on the 3d of October, 1913, taking the place of the Republican tariff act of 1909. In making their first assault upon the tariff President Wilson and his party followed in the wake of President Cleveland and his administration in 1893–4. It is always the tariff that is an eyesore to the Democratic Party. The avowed purpose of the law was to destroy protection and to produce revenue. It was successful as a destroyer of protection, but an utter failure as a revenue provider, as the following statement, compiled from official records, of the imports and duties collected thereon for the fiscal years from 1910 to 1916, both years inclusive, shows:

Importations, duties collected, and average rate of duty on all imports, by fiscal years.

Fiscal year.	Value of imports.	Duties collected.	Rate.
			Per cent.
1910[1]	$1,556,947,430	$333,683,445	21.4
1911[2]	1,527,226,105	314,498,071	20.6
1912[3]	1,653,264,934	311,257,348	18.8
1913[4]	1,813,008,234	318,142,344	17.6
1914[5]	1,893,925,657	292,128,528	15.4
1915[6]	1,674,169,740	209,268,107	12.5
1916[7]	2,197,883,510	211,866,222	9.6

[1] Payne law took effect Aug. 6, 1909—eleven months.
[2] First full year, Payne law.
[3] Democrats took control of House. Tariff revision by schedules, vetoed by President Taft.
[4] Democrats assume complete control; general revision under way.
[5] Underwood law took effect Oct. 4, 1913—nine months.
[6] Eleven months war period.
[7] Full war period. High record on imports, low record average duty rate.

The flood of importations and the paucity of the duties collected during the fiscal year 1916 demonstrate how open the door of protection is and how scant the duties collected have become. While the imports for 1916 were $544,000,000 in excess of the imports of 1912, yet the duties collected were nearly $100,000,000 less. In the meantime, while there was such a great decline in the duties collected under the new tariff law, there was no decline in the internal-revenue taxes, including the corporation and income taxes, but rather an increase. The following table, taken from the Statistical Abstracts, shows this:

Year.	Internal revenue.	Excess of ordinary receipts (+) or ordinary disbursements (−).
1910[1]	$289,933,519	+$15,806,324
1911[1]	322,529,201	+ 47,234,377
1912[1]	321,612,200	+ 37,224,502
1913[1]	344,416,966	+ 41,340,524
1914[1]	380,041,007	+ 34,418,677
1915[1]	415,069,646	− 19,519,322
1916[1]	512,723,287	− 23,819,839

[1] Includes corporation tax: 1910, $20,951,781; 1911, $33,516,977; 1912, $28,583,304; 1913, $35,000,000; 1914, corporation income tax $32,456,663, corporation excise tax $10,571,077, and individual income tax $28,253,535; 1915, emergency revenue $52,069,126, corporation income tax $39,155,597, and individual income tax $41,046,162; 1916, emergency revenue $84,278,302.13, corporation income tax $56,993,657.98; individual income tax $67,943,594.63.

Like the Democratic tariff law of 1894, this Democratic tariff act of 1913 produced a deficiency of revenue for the wants of the Government, and it became necessary to resort to other further methods of taxation, and this led to the enactment of the law of October 22, 1914, entitled "An act to increase the internal revenue, and for other purposes." This act, by its terms, was to remain in force until December 31, 1915. It imposed additional taxes on beer, spirits, wine, and tobacco, and taxes on occupations, and stamp taxes. The life of this act was extended by H. J. Res. 59, December 17, 1915, until the 31st day of December, 1916. Under this law there has been collected, up to the end of the fiscal year 1916, upwards of $136,347,428, and thus making up for the losses in duties to some extent. The Democrats ascribed the necessity for this legislation to the European war, but, as a matter of fact, the operation of their tariff law for the 10 months preceding the war clearly demonstrated that there would be such a falling off in duties that additional sources of revenue must be secured to meet the expenses of the Government regardless of the war.

I have not time to describe in detail the havoc wrought by the tariff act of 1913, in respect to the protection afforded by the act of 1909 to our various industries. I shall only refer to one matter, the raid made upon the farmers. Nearly all their products were either put upon the free list, or so greatly reduced as to be practically on the free list. Had it not been for the great European war our farmers would have sustained great losses from this change in our tariff. With a wheat crop of a billion bushels in the United States and over 300,000,000 bushels in Canada in 1915, our wheat farmers, but for the great war, would have had 60-cent wheat instead of a dollar a bushel and over. And the same pro rata difference would have occurred in respect to oats, barley, rye, and flax. The main crop of the South, cotton, has practically no competition, and hence is immune from tariff legislation. It is further to be noted in this connection, that that part of the tariff act of 1913, which provided for free sugar on and after the 1st of May, 1916, was repealed by the act of April 27, 1916, for by that time the Democratic Party had come to realize that a loss of $50,000,000 in sugar duties, would make too large a breach in the already scant duties collected under their tariff law.

CURRENCY LEGISLATION.

In the fall of 1907 there was a so-called bankers' monetary panic in New York City, which not only seriously affected the banks in that city, but also to a considerable extent affected banks in other parts of the country. For a time the banks in New York suspended cash payments and this led to the suspension of cash payments in many of the banks of our large cities. The panic finally subsided and spent its force by the end of the year without leaving the havoc and destruction in its wake that the panic of 1873 did. This panic led to the passage of the so-called Aldrich-Vreeland Act of May 30, 1908, which provided for the issuance of emergency currency through voluntary currency associations of national banks and also permitted national banks in certain cases to obtain additional circulation on other security than United States bonds. The act also provided for the appointment of a National Monetary Commission, "to inquire into and report to Congress what changes are necessary or desirable in the monetary system of the United States," and so forth.

This commission consisted of the following persons: Nelson W. Aldrich, chairman; Edward B. Vreeland, vice chairman; Julius C. Burrows; Eugene Hale; H. M. Teller; H. D. Money; Theodore E. Burton; James P. Taliaferro; BOIES PENROSE; JOHN W. WEEKS; Robert W. Bonynge; L. P. PADGETT; George F. Burgess; A. P. Pujo; George W. Prince; James McLachlan; A. Piatt Andrew, assistant to commission; and Arthur B. Shelton, secretary.

The commission made an exhaustive and thorough investigation, both at home and abroad, and gathered a large quantity of most valuable data and material, consisting of many volumes, and finally made its report to Congress on the 8th day of January, 1912, recommending, among other things, the establishment of a national reserve association, with a capital of $200,000,000, and with subsidiary local, or branch, associations throughout the country. Stock subscriptions were to be limited to National and State banks and to trust companies, but was not compulsory. A bill to carry out the recommendations of the commission was introduced, but no action was taken on the same. I shall not at this time enter into further details in regard to the report of the commission. It is a part of the monetary history of this country, and much of the commission's work was utilized and made use of in formulating the Federal reserve act, to which I shall later on call your attention.

While emergency currency associations were formed under the Aldrich-Vreeland Act, no currency was taken out under it until the threatened panic of 1914, for the reason that after the subsidence of the panic of 1907 normal monetary and business conditions prevailed, business was good, and money abundant at reasonable rates. By its terms the Aldrich-Vreeland Act expired by limitation June 30, 1914. In the Federal reserve act the life of the Aldrich-Vreeland law was extended for another year and a reduction of the tax on the emergency currency was also made. The tax provision in the original act is as follows:

National banking associations having circulating notes secured otherwise than by bonds of the United States shall pay for the first month a tax at the rate of 5 per cent per annum upon the average amount of such of their notes in circulation as are based upon the deposit of such securities, and afterwards an additional tax of 1 per cent per annum for each month until a tax of 10 per cent per annum is reached, and thereafter such tax of 10 per cent per annum upon the average amount of such notes.

In the extension act it is as follows:

National banking associations having circulating notes secured otherwise than by bonds of the United States shall pay for the first three months a tax at the rate of 3 per cent per annum upon the average amount of such of their notes in circulation as are based upon the deposit of such securities, and afterwards an additional tax rate of one-half of 1 per cent per annum for each month until a tax of 6 per cent per annum is reached, and thereafter such tax of 6 per cent per annum upon the average amount of such notes.

The act of August 4, 1914, made no change in the tax rate, but removed some other restrictions which were not germane after the passage of the Federal reserve law.

The war in Europe, which was impending in July and broke out in the early days of August, 1914, threatened our country with another monetary panic. The great, belligerent countries of Europe proceeded to dump upon our market, well-nigh by the wholesale, a large portion of the great mass of American securities held abroad, and this dumping led to the outflow of gold in great volume, and to a money stringency. Our great sheet anchor in this emergency, and which served to stay the panic, was not the Federal Reserve System, but the Aldrich-Vreeland law and the currency issued under it. Although the tax on this currency had been reduced and restrictions, rendered obsolete by the Federal reserve act, removed, yet fundamentally, and in its essence, it was the structure of the Aldrich-Vreeland Act that gave us the needed relief; under the circumstances the emergency currency would have been taken as readily under the original law, for the tax merely related to the period of circulation. The Secretary of the Treasury, in his report of December 7, 1914, after calling attention to what the Treasury Department had done to allay the panic and congratulating the country on its recovery, added:

> There is every reason why the country should look to the future with confidence so far as its trade, commerce, and industry are concerned. This has been accomplished, notwithstanding the fact that the Federal Reserve System authorized by the act of December 23, 1913, was at that time only in process of formation and was therefore unable to render any service in the situation.

Further on in his report he states:

> Fortunately, the Federal reserve act of December 23, 1913, materially modified in several important particulars and extended until June 30, 1915, the Aldrich-Vreeland Act, under and by virtue of which the Secretary of the Treasury is given discretion to issue emergency currency to national banks upon their application and upon their compliance with the provisions of the act. In anticipation of the necessity, large amounts of this emergency currency were sent beforehand to the subtreasury in New York and to the other subtreasuries throughout the country, so that upon the opening of the banks for business on August 3, 1914, the department was able to issue to them sufficient currency to enable them to cope with the situation as it developed.

FEDERAL RESERVE ACT.

In his letter of January 16, 1911, addressed to his colleagues on the Monetary Commission, calling their attention to the outline of a tentative plan, and so forth, Senator Aldrich said, among other things:

> If we can so amend the present national banking act as to permit the formation of an association of all the banks of the country to meet these needs, we shall have gone a long way toward solving the problem which is before us. If, then, in addition, we provide a more scientific basis for bank-note circulation, so that the volume of circulation will be responsive to the needs of business, we shall, I believe, have met the two main requirements of a satisfactory solution. In addition to that, if we can aid in creating a discount market in this country similar to the discount markets in Europe, so that the most liquid portion of our bank funds will not of necessity be forced to such a large degree as at present into the making of call loans upon stock-exchange collateral, but will, instead, be available for the needs of commercial business, we shall have so broadened our banking methods as to bring incalculable benefit to the commercial life of the country.

This statement contains the germ of all that is best in the Federal reserve act. And in the one particular, that of forming a single association of all the banks of the country, State and National, wherein the Federal reserve act departs from it, and in its place substitutes 12 associations, of national banks only, lies the weakness and expensiveness of the new system. The one system provided a common reservoir for all the banks, State and Federal. The other system provided 12 reservoirs for Federal banks only. It is true that State banks can join the new system, but its restrictions and disadvantages are such that very few State banks have joined or care to join it.

There were on June 30, last, 7,579 national banks, with a capital and surplus of $1,797,438,000, which were members of the new system, and about 22,460 State banks, with a capital and surplus of $2,530,700,000, which were not members of the system, besides a large number of trust companies. In all the commercial and industrial countries of the world, great and small, but ours a single great bank of issue stands at the head of their banks and monetary systems, while we have 12 heads for a part only of our banks. The reserve banks have added no new banking capital. Their capital and reserves have all come from the member banks. And so far, after being in operation since November 16, 1914—a period of one year and nine months—only 5 of the 12 banks have paid any dividends, and these 5 only a total dividend of 6 per cent. I add here a list of the 5 banks that have paid dividends and also a list of the net earnings of all the banks for May and June, 1916, and for the six months ending June 30, 1916:

Reserve bank's earnings.

Percentages of net earnings of the 12 Federal reserve banks, to capital, for May and June, and for the six months ended June 30 last, are as follows:

Federal reserve bank of—	May, 1916.	June, 1916.	6 months to June 30, 1916.
Boston	5.2	5.1	4.1
New York	4.2	3.6	2.4
Philadelphia	4.5	4.2	2.9
Cleveland	3.4	2.8	2.1
Richmond	5.7	5.5	3.3
Atlanta	4.4	4.0	2.9
Chicago	5.2	2.4	3.5
St. Louis	.5	1.6	.7
Minneapolis	3.1	3.3	2.0
Kansas City	7.3	7.1	5.1
Dallas	6.1	6.7	5.3
San Francisco	2.0	2.9	.7

[1] Deficit.

Five of the Federal reserve banks have so far declared dividends, as follows:

Federal reserve bank of—	Date declared.	Period covered Nov., 1914, to—	Rate.	Amount.
			Per cent.
Richmond	Dec., 1915	Dec. 21, 1915	6	$151,931
Do	Apr., 1916	....do.....	1	30,387
Atlanta	June, 1916	Dec. 21, 1915	6	129,134
Chicago	....do.....	Mar. 21, 1916	6	76,151
Dallas	Jan., 1916	June 30, 1915	6	65,522
Kansas City	July, 1916	....do.....	6	66,703

The new system had nothing to do with staying the threatened panic of 1914. That panic was stayed partly by closing the stock exchange, partly by clearing-house certificates, and largely by the currency taken out under the Aldrich-Vreeland law. So far the system has been mostly a burden to the member banks. Except in the five cases mentioned, they have received no dividends and have lost the 2 per cent interest on their reserves which they formerly secured. The system has added no new capital or new wealth to our country. Our prosperity and our abundance of money has come from our immense exports and the high prices resulting from the European war. Part of the proceeds of our exports have been invested in foreign bonds, but the great bulk of it has found its way into the coffers of the banks and the circulation of the country.

It reminded me of Don Quixote when I heard a Democratic Senator, the other day, speak of the great prosperity of the country and the abundance of money and ascribe it all to the virtue of the Federal reserve system.

COST AND EXPENSES OF THE SYSTEM.

Let me for a few moments call your attention to some of the costs and expenses of the new system. I get my data from the Second Annual Report of the Federal Reserve Board of December 31, 1915, for the fiscal year ending that date:

The salaries of the members of the board and of its officers and employees were, in the aggregate	$175,650
Annual salaries paid by the several reserve banks:
Boston bank	50,880
New York bank	155,978
Philadelphia bank	77,400
Cleveland bank	68,540
Richmond bank	55,980
Atlanta bank	47,304
Chicago bank	96,560
St. Louis bank	80,900
Minneapolis bank	45,920
Kansas City bank	55,640
Dallas bank	63,773
San Francisco bank	64,120
To this should be added counsel fees of three banks	3,300
Total of 12 banks	865,895
To the foregoing should be added the following items:
For Federal advisory council	$7,013
For governors' conferences	11,746
For directors' fees	44,096
For fees for legal services	21,960
For Federal reserve agents' conferences	4,209
For rent	160,152
For all other current expenses	274,871
For furniture and other equipment	284,620
Total expenses for fiscal year ending Dec. 31, 1914	186,910
Organization expenses	493,960
Salary of Federal Reserve Board, first fiscal year	26,055
Total	1,515,682

There are other minor items of expense which I have not gathered or noted that might be added, but these items I have given show that the new system up to December 31, 1915, cost in the aggregate the sum of $2,557,227. If we pro rate the salaries and expenses for the eight months ending August 31 on the basis of the salaries and expenses of the fiscal year ending December 31, 1915, we have an additional cost of the system of $974,684, which makes the aggregate cost up to August 31, 1916, about $3,531,911. Deducting the organization expenses and the cost of furniture and equipment, amounting to $778,580, from the aggregate of $3,531,911 leaves $2,753,331 as the overhead cost of the system for a period of one year and nine months, or a monthly average of $131,111. This indicates what an expensive system the 12-bank scheme is. So far as the currency is concerned, it is an improvement on the former system in this, that it provides for greater elasticity. But the system is weak in keeping the reserves scattered in 12 reservoirs instead of one great central reservoir that could, in case of a great emergency, immediately reach out a strong helping hand to any threatened point and give instantaneous and effective relief. It will not be an easy or speedy matter to pipe the reserves of the 12 scattered banks to any threatened point in case of a great emergency. Each of the 12 banks may conceive itself to be the sole seat of danger, and may decline to reach out a helping hand to its brother banks. One large, strong, central reservoir could, in the case of a great emergency, render far more effective aid than 12 small scattered reservoirs. Another important defect of the system is that it is so constructed that it practically leaves our great body of State banks outside of the pale of the system. The plan of the Monetary Commission included all banks, State and Federal, as well as trust companies. On the whole, the new system may be regarded as a partial improvement, but far from affording that perfect remedy and system that a great country like ours is entitled to.

But what else could we expect? It was the product of a partisan spirit, rather than a broad national spirit, receiving its inspiration from a party platform and nourished by its hostility to New York as the commercial and financial center of the country and the Jacksonian hatred of a single central bank. Personal politics, too, had a hand in the work, as appears from the fact that the two great commercial cities of the South—Baltimore and New Orleans—were ignored, and their places given to far inferior cities, and two reserve banks were located in the same State. Moreover, how many important localities were wrenched from their natural and accustomed business connection in order to piece out the scheme for favored places?

The system has not so far been tested in a monetary panic or a threatened panic. It is, to say the least, doubtful, on account of its 12 scattered reservoirs, whether it will prove as swift and effective as the Aldrich-Vreeland Act proved to be in the panic of 1914. Then the relief came from a single central source supplying the currency. Under the new system it would have to come from 12 widely scattered sources, each nervous for its own well-being. The survival of the Subtreasury system leaves it discretionary with the Secretary of the Treasury where to deposit the Government funds. He has 12 reserve banks and the Subtreasury at his option and for his favor. The Democracy should not be too boastful of their currency and financial legislative record. When Jackson, in 1833, brought about the downfall of the last United States bank by removing the Federal deposits, our country was left without any Federal or quasi Federal paper currency and was remitted to a vicious system of State banks and a so-called Subtreasury system. None but those whose memory and experience reaches back to the years before the Civil War can fully realize how embarrassing and how vicious that system was and how many losses it entailed upon the American people. This legacy of the Democracy we suffered from for nearly 30 years, until the Republican Party, in 1863–4, established our system of national banks. This system was instrumental in funding our great war debt and gave us for the first time a national paper currency of Treasury notes and national-bank notes, still in use, and perfectly safe and sound, and only deficient in elasticity. These national banks still survive and are the supporting pillars of the new system. The plan of building on them came from the Monetary Commission. The only survivor of Jacksonian Democracy is the Subtreasury system, and its survival is an incident, if not a necessity, of the 12-bank scheme. It is the only monument remaining of Democratic ante bellum financial legislation.

OTHER DEMOCRATIC LEGISLATION.

In the spring of 1914 the administration gave out, through the public press and otherwise, that a trilogy of bills would be introduced and passed to remedy most of the ills and wants of our industrial and economic system. The general purpose, it was declared, was to repress, regulate, and control all trusts and monopolies and all the great business interests of the country. These promised bills were afterwards introduced, and turned out to be as follows:

First. A bill "to create an Interstate Trade Commission, to define its powers and duties, and for other purposes," introduced in the House April 13, 1914.

Second. A bill "to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes," introduced in the House April 14, 1914. This bill was commonly called in its transit through the two Houses the Clayton anti-injunction bill.

Third. A bill "to amend section 20 of an act to regulate commerce, to prevent overissues of securities by carriers, and for other purposes," introduced in the House May 15, 1914. The purpose of this bill was to regulate the issuance of stock and securities by railroad corporations, and was really the most important and most valuable of the three bills. It passed the House, came to the Senate, and was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce. This committee on July 23, 1914, reported it back to the Senate favorably, with certain amendments. But by this time a change had come over the spirit of the dream of the Democracy, and this, the best of the three bills, was left to languish and finally die an ignominous death.

The Trade Commission bill became a law on September 26, 1914. It created a commission of five members, with a yearly salary of $10,000 each, and with a secretary at a salary of $5,000 a year. The jurisdiction and work of the commission is defined in the following paragraph of section 5 of the act:

That unfair methods of competition in commerce are hereby declared unlawful The commission is hereby empowered and directed to prevent persons, partnerships, or corporations, except banks and common carriers subject to the acts to regulate commerce, from using unfair methods of competition in commerce.

Practically all the rest of the act, aside from this, relates to procedure and to the enforcement of the decrees of the commission.

For a number of years there had been under Republican administrations a pretty vigorous prosecution of various big trusts and monopolies. This was not relished by them, and a hue and cry went up from them and their friends throughout the country that it was difficult for business interests to know just what they could and could not do under the antitrust law of 1890, and they vigorously, through the public press and otherwise, clamored for relief. Attempts had been made during the last administration of President Roosevelt to pass a law to relieve them against what they conceived to be the harshness of the enforcement of the antitrust law. This attempt failed, but they renewed their efforts, and the general impression among the public is that the Trade Commission act was passed as a partial antidote against the harshness of the antitrust law. We know this, that since the Trade Commission act was passed there have been no new prosecutions under the antitrust law and the old cases which were pending have moved along at a gentle gait. Where a great corporation has, in one way or another, absorbed all its competitors so it has all the field to itself, it is difficult to see what the Trade Commission can do in such cases. It is true that the Trade Commission law does not repeal the antitrust law, but the effect of the commission law is that big interests expect to go through its hopper before they are pushed into the hopper of the antitrust law. The best definition I have heard of the Trade Commission law was that expressed to me by a representative of one of the great interests, who said "it could at least be regarded as a purgatory to the hell of the antitrust law."

I can not find that the Trade Commission has so far judicially passed upon any case involving unfair methods of competition in commerce, or that it has, by its action in any case, put a stop to unfair methods of competition or granted substantial relief. I can find no information bearing directly on this matter in the first annual report of the commission of June 30, 1915. On the 29th day of August last I addressed and mailed to the commission a letter, of which the following is a copy:

UNITED STATES SENATE, COMMITTEE ON COMMERCE,
August 29, 1916.

SECRETARY FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION, City.

DEAR SIR: I wish you would, at your earliest convenience, send me a list of the cases that your commission has investigated or had hearings in, either on your own motion or upon request, under the Federal Trade Commission law, a list of the cases finally disposed of, and a list of cases and investigations pending, and in general a brief statement of the work and operation of your commission since it was organized. I also want to get a list of the number of employees in your commission and the salaries paid to them.

Yours, truly,

KNUTE NELSON.

On August 31 I received the following reply:

FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION,
Washington, August 30, 1916.

HON. KNUTE NELSON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: This is simply to acknowledge receipt of your request of August 29 for a detailed statement in connection with cases investigated by the commission, list and salaries of employees, etc. Your letter has been referred to the proper divisions of our office for preparation of the data requested.

Very truly, yours,

L. L. BRACKEN, Secretary.

I take it that from the leisurely methods that prevail in many of the Government departments quite a while will elapse before I secure the desired information.

Referring to the second of said acts—in common parlance called the Clayton law—"To supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes," its provisions may be grouped under two heads:

First. It lays out some work for the Trade Commission. It forbids in general terms discrimination in prices and gives a remedy by judicial procedure for such discrimination. It contains the superfluous definition, "That the labor of a human being is not a commodity or article of commerce." It forbids one corporation from holding stock in another corporation if the effect of it is to substantially lessen competition or create a monopoly. It forbids interlocking directors among banks, which has already been modified by legislation this session. It prohibits interlocking directors in cases of corporations other than banks where such corporations are competitors. It prohibits railroad corporations from having any dealings in excess of $50,000 with any corporation that has as its manager or on its board of directors any person who is a director, manager, or officer of a railroad company. A stay of proceedings, however, has been granted as to this paragraph by legislation passed at this session. The balance of this part of the act refers to the procedure involved in the enforcement of the provisions of the act and prescribes penalties, and so forth.

Second. This portion of the act was intended for the benefit of the labor organizations by modifying the law in relation to injunctions in labor disputes and to the enforcement and punishment of contempt in such cases. The purpose of this provision of the bill was to make it easier for labor organizations to inaugurate and maintain a strike. This part of the act, however, fails to give the labor organizations what they wanted and expected.

It prescribes that no injunction shall be granted in labor disputes except "to prevent irreparable injury to property or to a property right." It is the contention of labor organizations that the right to labor is not property that is entitled to relief by injunction, but in this they are entirely mistaken. The Supreme Court of Massachusetts has recently, in a well-considered case, unanimously decided that the right to labor is property and is as much entitled to protection under the Constitution of the United States as any other species of property. If the contention of the labor oragnization should prevail it would put a laboring man, who wanted to work and had nothing to sell but his work, outside of the pale of the protection of the law. While this particular act to some extent modified the law in reference to injunction procedure, it utterly failed to give the labor organizations the relief they looked for and wanted—that is, ample freedom to inaugurate and carry on strikes.

Another matter of legislation for which the Democracy will claim great credit is the so-called child-labor act. In reference to this, it can be said that there were only some three or four States in the Union that did not have on their statute books suitable and adequate child-labor laws, and in these few States, where the laws were imperfect and deficient, I have no doubt but what they would in due time have enacted the necessary laws. It is a very serious question, to my mind, whether this law is constitutional. I voted for it with the utmost reluctance, and to some extent because I was anxious to have the Supreme Court pass upon this important question, for if such legislation is valid, the limits to which the interstate-commerce clause of the Constitution can be applied are well nigh boundless.

The next piece of Democratic legislation upon which the party will plume itself, but which time will show will involve the squandering of $50,000,000 without furnishing any relief or doing anything but harm, is the shipping act. I have already on a former occasion discussed this measure, and so will not take up the time of the Senate any further in reference to it.

I must not omit at this time to call attention to the so-called rural-credit act. This was designed to furnish loans to farmers on their improved real estate, which they occupy and farm. The tenants, who are most needy, can secure no loans under this act. The requirements of the act are of such a complicated and involved character that, except in those localities of the country where money is scarce and interest high, few farmers will care to avail themselves of the law. And one feature of the act—that which provides for the creation of joint-stock banks—is liable in the hands of unscrupulous promoters to be made the instrument for defrauding the public by undue stock subscriptions. It is not likely at all that the law will be utilized in the New England States or in the States of the Central or Middle West. It may prove of some advantage to the planters of the Southern States, but their large body of tenant farmers will secure no relief under the law. It is a measure that carries a high-sounding title, but will prove of slight value to the farmers of the country.

Finally, Mr. President, I can not omit referring to the greatest legislative glory of the Democratic Party at this session—the passing of the law to increase by legislative fiat the wages of a certain class of railroad employees 25 per cent over what they are now receiving. This is the culmination of Democratic wisdom in the field of legislation. Time will tell whether this law will be of any permanent help or advantage to those who held us by the throat and threatened to strike, and whether it will help the Democracy to secure the reelection of President Wilson. One thing is certain, that if the increased wages are sustained and allowed, it will of necessity impose a great additional burden on the farmers and producers of the country. The ultimate burden will be cast upon them. This law is the apex of the scheme of so-called constructive legislation of the Democratic Party.

THE REVENUE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 16763) to increase the revenue, and for other purposes.

Mr. OWEN obtained the floor.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHAFROTH in the chair). Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. OWEN. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. I understand the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] desires to offer an amendment to the pending bill.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President——

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. LEWIS. If the Senator from Oklahoma will yield to me, I tender an amendment, which subsequently I will call up in connection with the present pending revenue bill. I thank the Senator from Oklahoma and also the Senator from North Carolina.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be printed, and lie on the table.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, if the Senator from Oklahoma will yield further, I desire to present two amendments.

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SIMMONS. On page 99, of the bill, in line 21, on behalf of the committee, I wish to suggest the addition of the word "stock," after the word "capital."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That occurs in the body of a committee amendment which has already been agreed to, and it will be necessary to reconsider the vote whereby the amendment was adopted.

Mr. SIMMONS. I understand that, and for the purpose of moving the amendment I have suggested and one other amendment in that paragraph, I move that the vote whereby the amendment of the committee as amended was adopted be reconsidered.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SIMMONS. Now, on page 99, in the amendment of the committee, on line 21, after the words "$1,000 of capital," I move to insert the word "stock," so that if will read "$1,000 of capital stock."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SIMMONS. Now, Mr. President, there was an amendment adopted to the committee amendment, in line 23, on the same page, adding, after the word "sums," the words "of capital, surplus, and undivided profits." After the word "capital" I move to insert the word "stock."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 99, line 23, after the word "sums," the committee amendment was amended by adding the words "of capital, surplus, and undivided profits." It is now proposed to amend the amendment by adding after the word "capital" the word "stock."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SIMMONS. Now, I move the adoption of the amendment as amended.

Mr. PENROSE. I ask that the Secretary read the amendment as it will read as amended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read as requested.

The SECRETARY. If amended, the first portion of the paragraph will read:

First. Corporations, joint-stock companies, and associations shall pay 50 cents for each $1,000 of capital stock, surplus, and undivided profits used in any of the activities or functions of their business, including such sums of capital stock, surplus, and undivided profits as may be invested in or loaned upon stocks, bonds, mortgages, real estate, or other securities.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is upon agreeing to the amendment as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

BANKING AND CURRENCY LEGISLATION.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] rather elaborately minimizes the value of the Federal reserve act and, incidentally, the acts of the present administration and the present majority in Congress in relation to the legislation passed for the protection of this country against panic. I had occasion to point out some days ago the relation of the present Democracy to the protection of this country against panic; but, in spite of the record laid before the Senate, we hear a general repetition of the charge that the protection of this country against panic was due to the Republican Party and the act of 1908.

The claim of the Republican Party as the protector of this country against panic is presumptuous beyond words. That party had control of the legislative power of this country for nearly a half century, and they permitted panic after panic to occur in this country without affording any legislative or executive relief whatever.

Why, Mr. President, it was not because the world did not know how to protect people against panics. Great Britain in 1866 provided an adequate means, consisting merely of permitting the Bank of England to issue legal-tender notes against commercial bills by ministerial permit when a panic occurred, thereby affording the people a convenient and safe form of money in all the abundance necessary to protect them against the hoarding of money when a panic occurs, and within 24 hours after that ministerial permit was given the Bank of England in every instance the panic instantly abated. Three times they did that afterwards, in every instance abating the panic within 24 hours.

The Republican Party, charged with the protection of this country, knew perfectly well what that record was; or, if they did not know, they were guilty of a failure to inform themselves properly and to discharge the function imposed upon them by the trust of power given them by the people of this country. Why, it has been nearly half a century since the German Empire adopted a similar method, permitting the imperial Reichsbank to issue legal-tender notes against other securities than gold—and that meant merely commercial bills at last—under a penalty of a 5 per cent interest charge, a rate slightly higher than the normal rate, or estimated to be so; and a financial panic was impossible in Germany after they adopted that system. Even the European war created no currency or credit panic in either England or Germany or countries dependent on them. Yet with that knowledge before the Republican Party, they did not pass a proper bill to protect this country against panic, nor can they claim to be ignorant nor secure the immunity which ignorance justifies in claiming protecton against the indignation of the people, because they were not ignorant; they were merely unintelligent and controlled by the Money Trust, whose control of our national credit system they were unwilling to break.

The Democracy, on the floor of the Senate in 1900, presented to the leaders of the Republican Party on this floor, through the chairman of the Democratic conference, James K. Jones, an adequate measure, that would have protected this country against the panic of 1907; and the Republican leaders on that side sat there like so many stoughten bottles or so many tenpins, refusing legislative relief.

SEVERAL SENATORS. What is a stoughten bottle?

Mr. OWEN. A stoughten bottle is an inanimate body, comparable to an animate Cheshire cat, which grins in derision and offers no relief.

Mr. President, the Republican Party, having had this Democratic proposal providing a method of relief made to them in 1900, refused to accept it, and were responsible, therefore, for the results of their gross legislative incompetency; and when at last the panic of 1907 came, with the destruction of property in this country, estimated by Senator Aldrich himself on the floor of the Senate in his speech of 1908 at over two thousand millions—and, in fact, the loss was far greater—instead of then giving this country the relief which it ought to have had, the Republican Party appointed a so-called Monetary Commission to investigate this question.

They investigated and investigated and investigated, killing time, during the whole of the year 1908, during the whole of the year 1909, during the whole of the year 1910, during the whole of the year 1911, and during the whole of the year 1912. Why did they not act? No Senator on that side can offer any reason, because the only principle involved in this question was that power should be placed somewhere, as in Germany and England, to issue legal-tender currency or available money against commercial bills under an interest charge high enough to cause automatic contraction. That is all there was about it. That is the only principle involved in it that was necessary; and the Democracy had presented that principle in the proposed amendment to the Aldrich bill in 1900, which the Republicans would not accept, either because they did not want to protect this country against panic, and thereby deprive their New York auxiliaries of the opportunities which a panic affords them, or because they did not have intellectual competency to understand how to govern the country, which I believe is equally the fact.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. WEEKS. If the Democracy was in favor of that principle in 1900, will the Senator tell the Senate why it filibustered against putting it into effect in 1908?

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, in 1908, instead of affording this country an adequate remedy, the Republicans turned this matter over to a monetary commission, providing for an indefinite delay; and I verily believe that if the Democratic Party had not come into power they would still be investigating it.

Mr. WEEKS. But, Mr. President, what I referred to was the filibuster against the passage of the Aldrich-Vreeland bill, which, as I recall, was led by the Senator from Oklahoma who is now speaking.

Mr. OWEN. The Senator is entirely mistaken about the filibuster being led by the Senator from Oklahoma. On the contrary, the Senator from Oklahoma on that occasion stated that, defective as that bill was, he would have voted for it rather than to have seen it fail, because it did at least, under great difficulty, under almost insurmountable and innumerable obstacles, afford some means by which an enlargement of currency could be brought about in case a panic had actually occurred. The Democrats did not filibuster against it. The filibuster, such as it was, was led by a Republican, Senator LA FOLLETTE, supported only by two Democrats.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, did the Senator from Oklahoma vote for the bill?

Mr. OWEN. The Senator from Oklahoma did not vote for the bill, because his vote was not necessary to secure even that measure of relief, and because the bill was so grently defective—as the Senator from Oklahoma pointed out at that time, February 25, 1908, in great detail and with great particularity—that he was justified in not voting for a bill that was so grossly defective.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President——

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WEEKS. I have in my hand letters from a large number of bankers who state that they would have taken out emergency currency in 1914 if there had been no amendment to the Aldrich-Vreeland Act. If it was so defective, why does the Senator suppose bankers were willing to act under the bill? The difference was that the banks had to pay a higher rate of interest, and you made it possible for the banks to make more money by taking out circulation under the amended bill. Moreover, it has been one of our policies to try to compel national banks to keep 40 per cent of their circulation in Government bonds; and you did away with the necessity of doing so, and enabled them to come in when they had not used Government bonds as a basis of circulation and get it in this way. In other words, you made it so easy for the banks to do these things, and so much more profitable, that of course they were glad to do it under the new conditions; but they could have done exactly the same thing under the old conditions when the emergency arose, and I have here a dozen or fifteen letters stating that that is true.

Mr. OWEN. Oh, Mr. President, it is perfectly easy to get a dozen or 15 letters from interested Republican bankers supporting any position asserted by the Republican Party leaders.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President——

Mr. OWEN. But the fact is that the Republicans passed a bill that was not used and never was used until the Democrats completely changed it, and practically suspended sections 1, 3, 5, 7, and 9, in order that the money might be obtained with some degree of facility and under conditions which the banks themselves could use. The lowering of the rate only permitted the country to get money at the lower rate and did not profit the banks, as the Senator himself must certainly know.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, the bill was never put into operation, because the country was under a Republican administration, and times were so good that it was not necessary to utilize it.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, when the war was declared and this Republican measure was on the books, extended with very important modifications and amendments by the Democracy as of December 23, 1913, when the rate was reduced to 3 per cent, for example, the banks, instead of acting under that, came running to Washington or used the long-distance telephone urging an amendment that would permit them to act under that bill. Nobody knew better than the New York banks how defective that bill was; and I was called up as chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency on the long-distance telephone by those banks in New York, the National City Bank included, by Mr. Vanderlip, urging amendments to that so-called Republican measure, in order that the banks might use it, and in order that they might find relief against a panic which was so urgently impending, and I myself was responsible for the immediate passage of those vital changes in the so-called Aldrich-Vreeland Act which made it workable and amended the very weaknesses which I had pointed out February 25, 1908, and not a Republican had the impudence to vote against this Democratic act of August 4, 1914, which protected the country from panic while the Federal Reserve Act was being put into executive action.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I ask that the Senator from Oklahoma mention now the date when that took place. That was August 1, 1914, when the trouble was on in New York, when the additional currency was required; and they did not use it, even with the reduced interest, until the Democratic vital changes and amendments of August 4 were passed so as to make it possible to use it.

Mr. OWEN. Why, it was absolutely notorious, and here is the language of the law. Listen to this:

The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to suspend the limitations imposed by section 1.

I protested on the floor of the Senate in 1908 against the limitations imposed by section 1 of that bill when it was passed, and I could not get any respectful recognition from that side of the Chamber.

The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to suspend the limitations imposed by section 3 of the act referred to.

I opposed the limitations of section 3 on the floor of the Senate in 1908, and could not get any recognition from that side of the Chamber.

The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to suspend the conditions and limitations of section 5 of said act.

Who was it that was praying for this relief? The banks of the country, who were face to face with a gigantic panic, with no immediate adequate protection except the grossly defective law passed by the Republican Party; and now the Republican leaders have the shameless assurance to come before the Senate and before the country and claim that they protected this country against panic!

Not only that, but section 9 of the act was modified so as to provide for 3 per cent. Under the provision of the original Aldrich Act the bank would have had to be almost in the throes of bankruptcy itself before it would have appealed to that act; but the conditions imposed were so serious that here the Democrats had to amend that act so as to suspend the provisions of sections 1, 3, 5, 7, and 9, practically rewriting it. More than that, the act had expired by its own limitation under the Republican legislative grant in June, 1914, and except for the Democracy, in the act of December 23, 1913, which was then writing the Federal reserve banking law as it ought to have been written by the Republican Party, there would not have been any provision whatever on the statute books except of the Federal reserve act itself, which was not completely in active operation.

The Federal reserve act was most potential, however, because the bill was written in the fall of 1913. The Federal Reserve Board had been appointed, these banks had been authorized, the agency was established, and that agency itself could have been put into operation in a comparatively few days; and the mere fact that there was in sight abundant relief was all that was absolutely essential to restore confidence.

I again call attention to this matter, because I think, as a matter of good conscience and of good faith to the country, statesmen representing the Republican side ought not to depart from the verity of history nor to make claims which are not justified by the plain truth.

The Senator wants to know why objection was made to the act of 1908. It took me three hours at that time to analyze the act of 1908, and I did on this floor analyze it most completely. I showed what the objections were, and I showed it in good faith, not as a partisan but as an American. I showed it, and I asked that the bill might be amended so as to meet the objections which were made. That prayer to the Republican side had no effect whatever; and afterwards we were compelled to amend it, when the crisis came, in the very way which I had on this floor substantially advised at that time.

Mr. President, the Republican Party permitted five years of investigation by the Monetary Commission, in which they spent some two or three hundred thousand dollars in giving certain citizens large fees for writing brochures on the banking act, which was practically of no importance because at last there was only one question in it—the right to issue money against adequate security under a penalty high enough to cause automatic contraction and thus prevent inflation; and that principle had been laid down by the Democracy in 1900 in an amendment to the Aldrich bill of that date which I personally drew.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President——

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. WEEKS. When the Senator from Oklahoma criticizes the work of the Monetary Commission I hope he will remember that 7 of the 17 members of that commission were Democrats, and the report of the commission was unanimous.

Mr. OWEN. Oh, I understand that, Mr. President; and that is not particularly important. I could choose without much difficulty from among 6,000,000 Democrats some party Democrats who entertain a Republican point of view.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I never saw one.

Mr. OWEN. Oh, yes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Not alive.

Mr. OWEN. Oh, yes; and you will find Republicans who entertain the Democratic point of view. There could be an advantageous "exchange of prisoners" without going very far from this Chamber.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. They are away off the reservation, then.

Mr. OWEN. As far as the Monetary Commission was concerned, it finally brought in a bill that would have concentrated all the powers of the credit system into one small group, and would have put that group in charge of a small number of men in Wall Street, the so-called Money Trust, and would have put the credit system of this country absolutely under the domination of three or four men who are now so potential in the financial world, and always will be potential, because of the enormous amount of money and property which they control in that great city, the financial metropolis of the Western Hemisphere and, I hope, soon to be the financial center of the world.

Mr. President, I do not wish to take up any more time of the Senate on this matter.

I will ask that we may agree to proceed to the consideration of the corrupt-practices act immediately upon the conclusion of the revenue bill now pending. I ask unanimous consent that that may be done.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent that the Senate may proceed to the consideration of the corrupt-practices act immediately after the conclusion of the pending bill. Is there objection?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, there is no need to call for a quorum at this time, because we can not tell when the pending bill is going to be voted upon. The Senator from Oklahoma can give notice, and at that time he can call it up and make the request. He can make the request then, but this is not the proper time to make it. I object.

Mr. OWEN. I give notice that I shall at that time bring the matter up.

Mr. SMOOT. That is all right.

Mr. OWEN. I hope Senators will not regard this matter lightly. The Senator from Utah, who is the chosen representative of the Republican side of the Chamber, who is always in his seat, who is perhaps the most industrious Senator in attendance upon this body, objects, and he evidently objects in their name.

Mr. SMOOT. No; I do not. I do not want the Senator to put any Republican Senator in that position.

Mr. OWEN. I am not putting any words in the Senator's mouth.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not want the Senator to put anyone else in that position. I am simply speaking for myself, and I speak for the orderly procedure of the legislation of this body.

Mr. OWEN. The Senator in reality can not speak for himself, occupying the position he does as the guard of honor on the other side. He is always on guard, and is relied upon by his side to be on guard. He discharges the duty and he takes upon himself the vicarious sacrifice of opposing the consideration of the corrupt-practices act. But the country can perfectly well understand it, and I want the country to understand it. I want the country to know that Republican Senators on the other side are not going to permit the consideration of the corrupt-practices act if they can help it.

Mr. KENYON. I simply wish to say to the Senator that that is not true as to all.

Mr. OWEN. No; I made an express exception in this matter of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON]. I put in the RECORD that the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON], the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], and other Senators whose names I mentioned—Senators NORRIS, BORAH, CLAPP, progressive Republicans—are in favor of passing the corrupt-practices act. I want it well understood that we are not going to adjourn this body without a resolute effort on my part to have that measure considered.

THREATENED RAILROAD STRIKE.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. President, I desire briefly to call attention to the ruling of the Chair this morning, not so much because of the importance of the matter I presented when I submitted an editorial and asked that it be printed as in order to preserve the rules of the Senate and orderly procedure in the future. I do not think the Chair understood exactly what the request was when the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] objected.

I asked that the editorial printed in the Post on "Stopping the strike" by the passage of the eight-hour law be printed in the RECORD, and the Senator from Utah, as usual, objected. I then, under the rule, sent the matter to the desk and asked to have it read by the Secretary, under Rule XI, which provides that—

When the reading of a paper is called for, and objected to, it shall be determined by a vote of the Senate, without debate. (Jefferson's Manual, sec. 32.)

I asked the Chair to put the question. I think the Chair misunderstood my request at the time, and I should like to ask again that the editorial be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will say that the condition in the Senate this morning was quite exceptional. The unfinisned business was before the Senate and the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] was on the floor for the purpose of addressing the Senate on that bill. The Chair took the liberty of saying he thought it would economize time to permit Senators to present uncontested matters that were not likely to lead to debate or delay. That was accepted by the Senate, and different Senators proceeded to present formal and uncontested matters.

When the request of the Senator from Kansas was presented the Senator from Utah objected, and it seemed perfectly plain to the Chair that it was likely to provoke debate, and he thought it was an implied violation of the terms on which the Chair had obtained consent from the Senate.

The Chair is quite aware of the rule to which his attention has been called by the Senator from Kansas, but it is not the universally accepted interpretation of it that at any time any Member at any stage of the proceedings may present a paper and ask that it be read. Within the sense of that rule there have been rulings which limit the right of presenting a paper at a particular time. The Chair regarded it as an implied violation of the unanimous consent under which we were at that time proceeding.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, Rule XI reads as follows:

When the reading of a paper is called for, and objected to, it shall be determined by a vote of the Senate, without debate.

There is now before the Senate the unfinished business. In the morning hour I have no doubt the Senator from Kansas could make the request he did, and if there was an objection raised to it, then the Presiding Officer would have a vote of the Senate upon it. But the unfinished business is before the Senate now and nothing can be done except by unanimous consent.

Further, I wish to say to the Senator from Kansas I care nothing about the article, but the reason why I objected was that we have undertaken to stop the printing of all editorials by unanimous consent in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. For the last month I think we have saved to the Government of the United States at least two thousand, yes, ten thousand dollars or more by such course. It is for that reason I objected. It was for that purpose that I gave notice over a month ago that I would object.

If the Senator from Kansas wants to have the editorial printed in the RECORD, he can read it as a part of his speech on this bill, but I can not say to the Senator from Kansas that he can have an editorial printed in the RECORD and to some other Senator he can not. Therefore, Mr. President, I shall object to the article being read by the Secretary. If the Senator wants to read it himself of course, he has that privilege.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will require unanimous consent or a motion to displace the unfinished business.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania will state it.

Mr. OLIVER. My point of order is that it is only in order to proceed with the unfinished business, and I hope the Senator in charge of the bill will insist on that course.

Mr. SIMMONS. I trust the Senator from Kansas will withhold this matter. He will have time to read the article if he wants it in the RECORD instead of taking up the time now. We are very anxious, if possible, to go ahead with the bill.

Mr. THOMPSON. I understand that I have a right to read the article at any time. It was with the idea of not taking up the time of the Senate by reading the article that I desired to have it printed in the RECORD.

Regarding the objection of the Senator from Utah, I observe that when editorials are produced on the Republican side of the Chamber that objection is not adhered to.

Mr. SMOOT. No; that is not the case.

Mr. THOMPSON. And it has not been adhered to this very day, for several Republican Senators have introduced and had printed in the RECORD similar matter.

Mr. SIMMONS. What I am suggesting to the Senator from Kansas is that under the objection of the Senator from Utah he would have to read the article, and that would take considerable time.

Mr. THOMPSON. That is why I wanted to have it printed in the RECORD now, without reading.

Mr. SIMMONS. I hope the Senator will keep the whole matter in abeyance until to-morrow or some other time when we are through with the pending bill, and then he can read it if the Senator from Utah insists on his objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. For the information of the Senator from Kansas the Chair will state that at any time when the paper is presented as a matter of right and an objection to the reading is made the Chair will submit the matter to the Senate.

Mr. THOMPSON. At this time all I wanted was to have a ruling of the Chair on the question. I am glad the Chair has taken that view, for I am sure it is in accordance with the rights of a Senator under Rule XI, to which I called attention.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. When it can be done without displacing the unfinished business by a proposition to take up some other matter.

Mr. SIMMONS. I hope the Senator from Kansas will let us go on with the pending bill. We have lost two hours this morning.

Mr. THOMPSON. It was to save time that I asked that the editorial be printed in the RECORD without reading, but on the request of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] I will defer the matter until a more opportune time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The article presented by the Senator from Kansas is a very short one, and he can read it in a very few minutes if he desires to do it.

Mr. THOMPSON. I thank the Presiding Officer, but I will not take the time to do it now.

THE REVENUE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 16763) to increase the revenue, and for other purposes.

Mr. OVERMAN. I submit an amendment to the pending bill, which I ask may be printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be printed and lie on the table. The next amendment of the Committee on Finance will be stated.

The Secretary proceeded to read the amendment of the committee, beginning on page 111, line 1, and read as follows:

DOCUMENTARY STAMP TAXES.

SEC. 63. Bonds, debentures, or certificates of indebtedness issued on and after the time this takes effect by any association, company, or corporation, on each $100 of face value or fraction thereof, 5 cents; and on each original issue, whether on organization or reorganization, of certificates of stock by any such association, company, or corporation, on each $100 of face value or fraction thereof, 5 cents; and on all sales, or agreements to sell, or memoranda of sales or deliveries or transfers of shares or certificates of stock in any association, company, or corporation, whether made upon or shown by the books of the association, company, or corporation, or by any assignment in blank, or by any delivery, or by any paper or agreement or memorandum or other evidence of transfer or sale, whether entitling the holder in any manner to the benefit of such stock, or to secure the future payment of money or for the future transfer of any stock, on each $100 of face value or fraction thereof, 2 cents; and on each original issue, whether on organization or reorganization, of certificates of stock having no face value in such association, company, or organization, 5 cents for each share or fraction thereof, unless the actual value of such share shall exceed $100, in which case stamps shall be affixed at the rate of 5 cents for each $100 or fraction thereof of the value on original issues, and 2 cents for each $100 or fraction thereof of value on sales or transfers: Provided, That it is not intended by this act to impose a tax upon an agreement evidencing a deposit of stock certificates as collateral security for money loaned thereon, which stock certificates are not actually sold, nor upon such stock certificates so deposited: Provided further, That in case of sale where the evidence of transfer is shown only by the books of the company the stamp shall be placed upon such books; and where the change of ownership is by transfer certificate the stamp shall be placed upon the certificate; and in cases of an agreement to sell or where the transfer is by delivery of the certificate assigned in blank there shall be made and delivered by the seller to the buyer a bill or memorandum of such sale, to which the stamp shall be affixed; and every bill or memorandum of sale or agreement to sell before mentioned shall show the date thereof, the name of the seller, the amount of the sale, and the matter or thing to which it refers. And any person or persons liable to pay the tax as herein provided, or anyone who acts in the matter as agent or broker for such person or persons, who shall make any such sale, or who shall in pursuance of any such sale deliver any such stock, or evidence of the sale of any such stock or bill or memorandum thereof, as herein required, without having the proper stamps affixed thereto, with intent to evade the foregoing provisions, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall pay a fine of not exceeding $1,000, or be imprisoned not more than six months, or both, at the discretion of the court.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I desire to have the paragraphs adopted as a part of the bill as we go along.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The title embraces a single topic, and the Chair is treating it as a single amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. All right, Mr. President.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the amendment and read as follows:

SEC. 64. Upon each sale, agreement of sale, or agreement to sell any products or merchandise at any exchange or board of trade or other similar place, for future delivery, for each $100 in value of said sale or agreement of sale or agreement to sell, 1 cent, and for each additional $100 or fractional part thereof in excess of $100, 1 cent: Provided, That on every sale or agreement of sale or agreement to sell as aforesaid there shall be made and delivered by the seller to the buyer a bill, memorandum, agreement, or other evidence of such sale, agreement of sale, or agreement to sell to which there shall be affixed a lawful stamp or stamps in value equal to the amount of the tax on such sale. And every such bill, memorandum, or other evidence of sale or agreement to sell shall show the date thereof, the name of the seller, the amount of the sale, and the matter or thing to which it refers; and any person or persons liable to pay the tax as herein provided, or anyone who acts in the matter as agent or broker for such person or persons who shall make any such sale or agreement of sale or agreement to sell, or who shall, in pursuance of any such sale, agreement of sale, or agreement to sell, deliver any such products or merchandise without a bill, memorandum, or other evidence thereof as herein required, or who shall deliver such bill, memorandum, or other evidence of sale or agreement to sell without having the proper stamps affixed thereto with intent to evade the foregoing provisions, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall pay a fine of not exceeding $1,000, or be imprisoned not more than six months, or both, at the discretion of the court.

SEC. 65. That no bill, memorandum, agreement, or other evidence of such sale or agreement of sale or agreement to sell in case of products or merchandise actually delivered at the time of sale or while in vessel, boat, or car, and actually in course of transportation shall be subject to this tax, provided such bill, memorandum, agreement, or other evidence of such sale or agreement of sale or agreement to sell shall be accompanied by bills of lading or vouchers showing that the said products are actually in course of transportation as aforesaid.

SEC. 66. Conveyance: Deed, instrument, or writing, whereby any lands, tenements, or other realty sold shall be granted, assigned, transferred, or otherwise conveyed to, or vested in, the purchaser or purchasers, or any other person or persons, by his, her, or their direction, when the consideration or value of the interest or property conveyed, exclusive of the value of any lien or encumbrance thereon, exceeding $500, 50 cents; and for each additional $500 or fractional part thereof in excess of $500, 50 cents: Provided, That nothing contained in this paragraph shall be so construed as to impose a tax upon any instrument or writing given to secure a debt.

SEC. 67. Entry of any goods, wares, or merchandise at any customhouse, either for consumption or warehousing, not exceeding $100 in value, 25 cents; exceeding $100 and not exceeding $500 in value, 50 cents; exceeding $500 in value, $1.

SEC. 68. Entry for the withdrawal of any goods or merchandise from customs bonded warehouse, 50 cents.

SEC. 69. SEC. 70. Each policy of insurance, or bond or obligation of the nature of indemnity for loss, damage, or liability issued, or executed, or renewed by any person, association, company, or corporation, transacting the business of fidelity, employer's liability, plate glass, steam boiler, burglary, elevator, automatic sprinkler, or other branch of insurance (except life, personal accident, and health insurance, and insurance described and taxed or exempted in the preceding paragraph and excepting also workmen's compensation insurance carried on by the members thereof solely for their own protection and not for profit), and each bond undertaking or recognizance, conditioned for the performance of the duties of any office or position, or for the doing or not doing of anything therein specified, or other obligation of the nature of indemnity, and each contract or obligation guaranteeing the validity or legality of bonds or other obligations issued by any State, county, municipal, or other public body or organization, or guaranteeing titles to real estate or mercantile credits executed or guaranteed by any liability, fidelity, guarantee, or surety company upon the amount of premium charged, one-half of 1 cent of each dollar or fractional part thereof: Provided, That policies of reinsurance shall be exempt from the tax herein imposed by this paragraph.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Sections 69 and 70 provide for stamps on fire-insurance policies. We desire to have those two sections disagreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The part of the amendment embraced in sections 69 and 70 will be disagreed to unless there is objection. The Chair hears none, and such will be the order.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the amendment, as follows:

SEC. 71. Passage ticket, for each passenger, sold in the United States for passage by any vessel to a foreign port or place, if costing not exceeding $30, $1; costing more than $30 and not exceeding $60, $3; costing more than $60, $5: Provided, That such passage tickets, costing $10 or less, shall be exempt from taxation.

SEC. 72. Every seat sold in a palace or parlor car and every berth sold in a sleeping car, 1 cent, to be paid by the company selling the same.

SEC. 73. That all internal-revenue agents and inspectors be granted leave of absence with pay, which shall not be cumulative, not to exceed 30 days in any calendar year, under such regulations as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may prescribe.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, I inquire if this is subject to a point of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair holds that it is not. This is not an appropriation bill, and under our rule there is no question of new legislation or relevancy involved in it.

Mr. SHIELDS. I did not understand the Senator from Pennsylvania.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania made a parliamentary inquiry whether or not a point of order would lie to the particular provision, which changes existing legislation, such as is applicable to a general appropriation bill. The Chair held that there was no question of relevancy or germaneness involved in our work here.

Mr. SHIELDS. Did the Senator make a point of order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator did not.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the amendment, as follows:

SEC. 74. That after the time this title takes effect there shall be levied, collected, and paid, for and in respect of the several bonds, debentures, or certificates of stock and of indebtedness, and other documents, instruments, matters, and things mentioned and described in sections 63 to 73, inclusive, of this title, or for or in respect of the vellum, parchment, or paper upon which such instruments, matters, or things, or any of them, shall be written or printed by any person or persons, or party who shall make, sign, or issue the same, or for whose use or benefit the same shall be made, signed, or issued, the several taxes or sums of money set down in figures against the same, respectively, or otherwise specified or set forth herein.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. On page 118, line 2, I offer an amendment to come in at the close of the section just read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Add at the end of the section the following proviso:

Provided, That none of the bonds, debentures, certificates of stock, conveyances, mortgages, or other documents, instruments, matters, and things provided for in the Federal farm-loan act of July 17, 1916, shall be subject to the provisions of this title.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the amendment, as follows:

SEC. 75. That if any person shall forge or counterfeit, or cause or procure to be forged or counterfeited, any stamp, die, plate, or other instrument, or any part of any stamp, die, plate, or other instrument, which shall have been provided, or may hereafter be provided, made or used in pursuance of this title, or shall forge, counterfeit, or resemble, or cause or procure to be forged, counterfeited, or resembled, the impression, or any part of the impression, of any such stamp, die, plate, or other instrument as aforesaid, upon any vellum, parchment, or paper, or shall stamp or mark, or cause or procure to be stamped or marked, any vellum, parchment, or paper with any such forged or defraud the United States of any of the taxes hereby imposed, or any stamp, die, plate, or other instrument, as aforesaid, with intent to defraud the United States of any of the taxes hereby imposed or any part thereof; or if any person shall utter, or sell, or expose for sale, any vellum, parchment, paper, article, or thing having thereupon the impression of any such counterfeited stamp, die, plate, or other instrument, or any part of any stamp, die, plate, or other instrument, or any such forged, counterfeited, or resembled impression, or part of impression, as aforesaid, knowing the same to be forged, counterfeited, or resembled; or if any person shall knowingly use or permit the use of any stamp, die, plate, or other instrument, which shall have been so provided, made, or used as aforesaid, with intent to defraud the United States; or if any person shall fraudulently cut, tear, or remove, or cause or procure to be cut, torn, or removed, the impression of any stamp, die, plate, or other instrument which shall have been provided, made, or used in pursuance of this act from any vellum, parchment, or paper, or any instrument or writing charged or chargeable with any of the taxes imposed by law; or if any person shall fraudulently use, join, fix, or place, or cause to be used, joined, fixed, or placed to, with, or upon any vellum, parchment, paper, or any instrument or writing charged or chargeable with any of the taxes hereby imposed, any adhesive stamp, or the impression of any stamp, die, plate, or other instrument, which shall have been provided, made, or used in pursuance of law, and which shall have been cut, torn, or removed from any other vellum, parchment, or paper, or any instrument or writing charged or chargeable with any of the taxes imposed by law; or if any person shall willfully remove or cause to be removed, alter, or cause to be altered, the canceling or defacing marks of any adhesive stamp with intent to use the same, or to cause the use of the same, after it shall have been once used, or shall knowingly or willfully sell or buy such washed or restored stamp, or offer the same for sale, or give or expose the same to any person for use, or knowingly use the same, or prepare the same with intent for the further use thereof; or if any person shall knowingly and without lawful excuse (the proof whereof shall lie on the person accused) have in his possession any washed, restored, or altered stamp which has been removed from any vellum, parchment, paper, instrument, or writing, then, and in every such case, every person so offending, and every person knowingly and willfully aiding, abetting, or assisting in committing any such offenses as aforesaid, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, upon conviction thereof, shall forfeit the said counterfeit stamps and the articles upon which they are placed, and shall be punished by fine not exceeding $1,000, or by imprisonment and confinement at hard labor not exceeding five years, or both, at the discretion of the court.

SEC. 76. That in any and all cases where an adhesive stamp shall be used for denoting any tax imposed by this title, except as hereinafter provided, the person using or affixing the same shall write or stamp thereupon the initials of his name and the date upon which the same shall be attached or used so that the same may not again be used. And if any person shall fraudulently make use of an adhesive stamp to denote any tax imposed by this title without so effectually canceling and obliterating such stamp, except as before mentioned, he, she, or they shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall pay a fine of not exceeding $500 or be imprisoned not more than six months, or both, at the discretion of the court.

SEC. 77. That the collectors of the several districts are hereby authorized and required to furnish to any assistant treasurer of the United States, or designated depositary thereof, or any postmaster located in their collection districts, respectively, a suitable quantity of adhesive stamps, without prepayment therefor, and may in advance require of any designated depositary, assistant treasurer of the United States, or postmaster, a bond, with sufficient sureties, to an amount equal to the value of the adhesive stamps which may be placed in his hands and remain unaccounted for, conditioned for the faithful return, whenever so required, of all quantities or amounts undisposed of, and for the payment monthly of all quantities or amounts sold or not remaining on hand. And it shall be the duty of such collectors to supply their deputies with, or sell to other parties within their respective districts who may make application therefor, adhesive stamps, upon the same terms allowed by law or under the regulations of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, who is hereby authorized to make such other regulations not inconsistent herewith for the security of the United States and the better accommodation of the public, in relation to the matters hereinbefore mentioned, as he may judge necessary and expedient. And the Secretary of the Treasury may from time to time make such regulations as he may find necessary to insure the safe-keeping or prevent the illegal use of all such adhesive stamps.

SEC. 78. That any person or persons who shall make, sign, issue, sell, or transfer, or who shall cause to be made, signed, issued, registered, sold, or transferred any instrument, document, or paper of any kind or description whatsoever mentioned in sections 63 to 73, inclusive, of this title, without the same being duly stamped, or having thereupon an adhesive stamp for denoting the tax chargeable thereon, and canceled in the manner required by law, with intent to evade the provisions of this title, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $50, or by imprisonment not exceeding six months, or both, in the discretion of the court: Provided, That hereafter, in all cases where the party has not affixed to any instrument the stamp required by law thereon at the time of issuing, selling, or transferring the said bonds, debentures, or certificates of stock or of indebtedness, and he or they, or any party having an interest therein, shall be subsequently desirous of affixing such stamp to said instrument, or, if said instrument be lost, to a copy thereof, he or they shall appear before the collector of internal revenue of the proper district, who shall, upon the payment of the price of the proper stamp required by law, and of a penalty of $10, and, where the whole amount of the tax denoted by the stamp required shall exceed the sum of $50, on payment also of interest, at the rate of 6 per cent, on said tax from the day on which such stamp ought to have been affixed, affix the proper stamp to such bond, debenture, certificate of stock or of indebtedness or copy, and note upon the margin thereof the date of his so doing, and the fact that such penalty has been paid; and the same shall thereupon be deemed and held to be as valid, to all intents and purposes, as if stamped when made or issued: And provided further, That where it shall appear to said collector, upon oath or otherwise, to his satisfaction, that any such instrument has not been duly stamped, at the time of making or issuing the same, by reason of accident, mistake, inadvertence, or urgent necessity, and without any willful design to defraud the United States of the stamp, or to evade or delay the payment thereof, then and in such case, if such instrument, or, if the original be lost, a copy thereof, duly certified by the officer having charge of any records in which such original is required to be recorded, or otherwise duly proven to the satisfaction of the collector, shall, within 12 calendar months after the making or issuing thereof, be brought to the said collector of internal revenue to be stamped, and the stamp tax chargeable thereon shall be paid, it shall be lawful for the said collector to remit the penalty aforesaid and to cause such instrument to be duly stamped. And when the original instrument, or a certified or duly proven copy thereof, as aforesaid, duly stamped so as to entitle the same to be recorded, shall be presented to the clerk, register, recorder, or other officer having charge of the original record, it shall be lawful for such officer, upon the payment of the fee legally chargeable for the recording thereof, to make a new record thereof, or to note upon the original record the fact that the error or omission in the stamping of said original instrument has been corrected pursuant to law; and the original instrument or such certified copy, or the record thereof, may be used in all courts and places in the same manner and with like effect as if the instrument had been originally stamped: And provided further, That in all cases where the party has not affixed the stamp required by law upon any such instrument issued, registered, sold, or transferred at a time when and at a place where no collection district was established, it shall be lawful for him or them, or any party having an interest therein, to affix the proper stamp thereto, or, if the original be lost, to a copy thereof. But no right acquired in good faith before the stamping of such instrument, or copy thereof, as herein provided, if such record be required by law, shall in any manner be affected by such stamping as aforesaid.

SEC. 79. That hereafter no instrument, paper, or document required by law to be stamped, which has been signed or issued without being duly stamped, or with a deficient stamp, nor any copy thereof, shall be recorded until a legal stamp or stamps, denoting the amount of tax, shall have been affixed thereto, as prescribed by law: Provided, That any bond, debenture, certificate of stock, or certificate of indebtedness issued in any foreign country shall pay the same tax as is required by law on similar instruments when issued, sold, or transferred in the United States; and the party to whom the same is issued, or by whom it is sold or transferred, shall, before selling or transferring the same, affix thereon the stamp or stamps indicating the tax required.

SEC. 80. That no instrument, paper, or document required by law to be stamped shall be deemed or held invalid and of no effect for the want of a particular kind or description of stamp designated for and denoting the tax charged on any such instrument, paper, or document, provided a legal documentary stamp or stamps denoting a tax of equal amount shall have been duly affixed and used thereon.

SEC. 81. That all bonds, debentures, or certificates of indebtedness issued by the officers of the United States Government, or by the officers of any State, county, town, municipal corporation, or other corporation exercising the taxing power, shall be, and hereby are, exempt from the stamp taxes required by this title: Provided, That it is the intent hereby to exempt from the stamp taxes imposed by this title such State, county, town, or other municipal corporations in the exercise only of functions strictly belonging to them in their ordinary governmental, taxing, or municipal capacity: Provided further, That stock and bonds issued by cooperative building and loan associations, mutual ditch or irrigating companies, and building and loan associations or companies that make loans only to their shareholders shall be exempt from the tax herein provided.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. In line 7, after the word "and" where it first occurs, to make the purpose entirely clear, I move to insert the words "all papers and instruments issued by or to."

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Is that the proviso on page 126?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. How does the Senator propose to amend it?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will first state the amendment to the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 126, line 7, after the word "and," insert the words "all papers and instruments issued by or to," so as to read:

And all papers and instruments issued by or to building and loan associations or companies, etc.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The Secretary resumed and concluded the reading of the amendments, as follows:

SEC. 82. That the Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall cause to be prepared and distributed for the payment of the taxes prescribed in this title suitable stamps denoting the tax on the document, article, or thing to which the same may be affixed, and he is authorized to prescribe such method for the cancellation of said stamps, as substitute for or in addition to the method provided in this title, as he may deem expedient. That the adhesive stamps used in the payment of the tax levied in sections 63 to 73, inclusive, of this title shall be furnished for sale by the several collectors of internal revenue, who shall sell and deliver them at their face value to all persons applying for the same, except officers or employees of the Internal Revenue Service: Provided, That such collectors may sell and deliver such stamps in quantities of not less than $100 of face value, with a discount of 1 per cent, except as otherwise provided in this title.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That is a clause of the stamp-tax provision, Mr. President, and I move its adoption.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The formal matter may be attended to. The Secretary will be directed, unless there is objection, to make the necessary changes in sectionizing the bill. Unless there is objection the committee amendment as amended will be agreed to. The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Now, I ask that the Senate turn back to page 102 of the bill in reference to the taxes on theaters and amusements. We heretofore passed that over, by request, until the next day.

Mr. PENROSE. To what page does the Senator from Georgia refer?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. To page 102, beginning on line 22.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I heretofore asked that that paragraph go over until I could make a further examination into certain correspondence that I have received criticizing the paragraph; but, taking it as a whole, I do not know whether or not we could better the provision, unless we should disagree to the whole section and follow the provision of the House bill, with certain amendments. I think, from the correspondence which I have had, there is almost as much criticism of the provision of the House bill as there is of the Senate provision.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. There is very much more.

Mr. SMOOT. Therefore, Mr. President, I shall not at this time object to an agreement to the provision, although I do think that the rates are exceedingly high upon the theaters and amusement halls in the smaller cities.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Senator will observe the provision we have made with reference to the smaller towns.

Mr. SMOOT. I have noticed the provision beginning in line 9, on page 103, which reads:

That in cities, towns, or villages of 5,000 inhabitants or less the amount of such payment shall be one-half of that above stated.

That helps considerably. But the smaller cities and the cities containing between 5,000 and 10,000 inhabitants are not taken care of; and I will say to the Senator that my correspondence shows that in cities having between 5,000 and 10,000 inhabitants, basing the number of amusement houses on the population, there are more of them than there are in the smaller cities of under 5,000 inhabitants; in other words, there is more competition as to theaters or amusement places in cities of that size than there is in the smaller cities.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. While that may be true, they come very much nearer running all the time. We took up the House bill, and our subcommittee heard representatives of the amusement halls and of the theaters, and we found that they very much preferred the old law. The only complaint we had against the old law from them was that in the smaller towns, where the theaters run only a part of the time, they were overtaxed. Then I sought to find from them a measure of the size of the town which would run its theaters and amusement halls only about half the time; and from the information they gave us, we decided on 5,000 inhabitants as the size of what was the proper basis of distinction.

I wish to say, Mr. President, that since we adopted this modification I have had letters from amusement people, but not a single objection to the modified provision. Of course they, like everybody else, would rather not pay any tax at all; but they seem to think that we are now treating them very fairly.

The trouble about the House provision is that while it was based upon receipts, it was the gross receipts, and not the net receipts. We first tried to change it to net receipts, but there we found the trouble was that many of the smaller amusement houses kept no books, and that there was really no way to tell what the net receipts were. Finally the responsibility, after the Senator from Maine [Mr. JOHNSON] left, was largely devolved upon me to try to reach an equitable and fair mode if we were going to keep any of the tax at all. We then decided that this was the fairest way in which to proceed, unless we exempted them altogether. We needed the revenue, and, therefore, did not think we could exempt them.

Mr. SMOOT. As to the small amusement halls, if the proprietor takes anything for his compensation for the time he devotes to the business, there would be no net receipts.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. In many of the very small amusement houses the net receipts afford a bare compensation to the people who are conducting them.

Mr. SMOOT. That is about all.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. But as to those the tax is very small; it is almost nothing.

Mr. SMOOT. I was wondering whether or not the Senator from Georgia would raise the limit in the provision as to the population from 5,000 to 10,000 inhabitants. I think that in cities having above that number they could pretty well take care of themselves.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I hardly feel justified in doing so now; but if, on consultation with the House conferees, they should be satisfied to put it up to 10,000, I should not object.

Mr. SMOOT. What I suggest is, that if we make it 10,000 now, and it goes into conference, then it could be lowered; but, if we leave it at 5,000, the conferees can not very well increase the number. I believe that the Senator, if he will carefully consider the statement I have made—and I make it upon the correspondence which I have received—will agree to my suggestion.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Let it remain in this shape now, and before the bill comes into the Senate, if I find that that can be done, I will reserve the right to change it in the Senate.

Mr. GALLINGER. I desire to ask the Senator from Georgia if this phraseology would, beyond question, cover moving-picture establishments?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Oh, yes.

Mr. GALLINGER. There is nothing stated about them in the bill.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. They are covered beyond any question.

Mr. GALLINGER. Do they come under the head of "theaters and concert halls"?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Under the head of "amusement hall." They are included.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Unless there is objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, I should like the RECORD to show that the question was put; not that it was "agreed to without objection"; but that a vote was had upon the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will submit the question in that form. As many as are in favor of the adoption of the amendment will signify it by saying aye——

Mr. GALLINGER. I do not find the word "amusement" in the amendment, and the question is whether the terms "theaters" or "concert halls" would cover those places all over the country where moving pictures are exhibited. They ought to be taxed, of course, as well as other places. If the language read "or other places of amusement" there would be no question. If the Senator would insert the language "concert halls or other places of amusement," that would cover it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New Hampshire move to amend the amendment in that respect?

Mr. GALLINGER. I offer that amendment—that after the word "halls," on page 102, line 23, the words "or other places of amusement" be inserted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Finance was, under the head of "Title V—Dyestuffs," on page 127, line 2, to change the number of the section from "400" to "83"; and in the same line, after the word "That," to strike out "on and after the day following the passage of this act," so as to make the clause read:

SEC. 83. That, except as otherwise specially provided for in this title, there shall be levied, collected, and paid upon the articles named in this section when imported from any foreign country into the United States or into any of its possessions, except the Philippine Islands and the islands of Guam and Tutuila, the rates of duties which are prescribed in this title, namely:

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Free list," on page 127, after line 10, to strike out:

Group I. Acenaphthene, anthracene, benzol, carbazol, cresol, cumol, fluorene, methylanthracene, methylnapthalene, napthalene, pyridin, quinolin, toluol, xylol, crude coal tar, pitch of coal tar, dead or creosote oil, anthracene oil, all other distillates which on being subjected to distillation yield less than 5 per cent of tar acids in the portion distilling below 200° C., and all other products that are found naturally in coal tar, whether produced or obtained from coal tar or other source, and not otherwise specially provided for in this title, shall be exempt from duty.

And insert:

Group I. Acenaphthene, anthracene having a purity of less than 25 per cent, benzol, carbazol having a purity of less than 25 per cent, cresol, cumene, fluorene, metacresol having a purity of less than 90 per cent, methylanthracene, methylnaphthalene, naphthalene having a solidifying point less than 79° C., orthocresol having a purity of less than 90 per cent, paracresol having a purity of less than 90 per cent, pyridine, quinoline, toluene, xylene, crude coal tar, pitch of coal tar, dead or creosote oil, anthracene oil, all other distillates which on being subjected to distillation yield in the portion distilling below 200° C. a quantity of tar acids less than 5 per cent of the original distillate, and all other products that are found naturally in coal tar, whether produced or obtained from coal tar or other source, and not otherwise specially provided for in this title, shall be exempt from duty.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from North Carolina if the treaty with Cuba providing for rates that are preferential will in any way be affected by this law?

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not know that I comprehend the Senator's question.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. We have a treaty which gives Cuba certain advantages over other foreign countries in the matter of importations into this country, and I should like to know whether this provision with reference to dyestuffs repeals that preferential duty?

Mr. SIMMONS. Does the Senator mean whether the preferential allowed to Cuba upon her imports into this country from that country would be affected by this dyestuffs provision?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes; by the provision which has just been read.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think not.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I refer to section 83.

Mr. SIMMONS. If we imported any dyestuffs from Cuba probably it would; but I was not aware that we imported any dyestuffs from Cuba.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I do not know that we now import them, but I do know that there is a very strong movement on foot to manufacture dyestuffs in Cuba from Cuban wood; and they would be very important in this market, especially in the present condition of that industry.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think clearly if dyestuffs should be manufactured in Cuba and imported into this country, that, under the treaty, they would get the benefit of the 20 per cent differential; but, as I have said to the Senator, it has not come to my knowledge that in any way the question is now in issue.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I realize that a treaty is a very high law, but that a statute may nullify it nevertheless, and I am asking the Senator from North Carolina if he understands this statute would nullify that treaty?

Mr. SIMMONS. Of course not.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, if the Senator from Michigan will permit me, I will state that the paragraph immediately under consideration, placing certain crude raw materials and dyestuffs on the free list, of course, would not affect the Cuban treaty; but the two following paragraphs unquestionably would annul the Cuban treaty in so far as they relate to dyestuffs. The fact that it is not referred to in the later enactment would wipe out the treaty, but it would only wipe it out in relation to dyestuffs.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. That is just the point I am making. I think this legislation would wipe out that treaty. I think this proposed law would supersede the treaty. If that is true, the loss of the advantages which we might otherwise derive from our proximity to Cuba in the manufacture of dyestuffs, which we particularly need, would be rather a serious matter.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not think it is a serious matter. I will say to the Senator from Michigan; but I think he unquestionably is right, that the enactment of this law would nullify the Cuban treaty, so far as this law goes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I do not think that is the intention of the committee.

Mr. SIMMONS. I will state to the Senator from Michigan very frankly that this question was not brought to the attention of the committee at all. Personally I had nothing more to do with it than any other member of the committee, but since the Senator has brought it directly to our attention, we will look into it.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I shall be glad if the Senator from North Carolina will do so, because I happen to know that plans have been made for the manufacture of dyestuffs from Cuban woods. It would be very important to the American people that the world's supply of dyestuffs should be increased.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the committee amendment. It is agreed to, unless there is objection. The Chair hears none.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, if we are going on with the dyestuffs schedule, I desire to submit some observations, but I understand the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES] has another matter which he wishes to bring to the attention of the Senate.

Mr. HUGHES. I ask unanimous consent to be permitted to revert to the wine schedule, and I ask that the Secretary read the amendment which I have sent to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator indicate a little more particularly where the amendment is?

Mr. HUGHES. I will ask the Secretary if the amendment is not at the desk? It was sent there some time ago.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will endeavor to locate the amendment to which the Senator refers.

Mr. HUGHES. The amendment relates to the wine title. I sent it to the desk some time ago, and understood the Secretary to say that it would be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. When did the Senator offer the amendment?

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President, I withdraw my request for the present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator withdraws his request for the present.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I think that this dyestuffs schedule is of so much importance that it should be considered by a quorum, and I call the attention of the Chair to the fact that there is no quorum present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama suggests the absence of a quorum. Let the Secretary call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Husting	Phelan	Smoot
Bankhead	La Follette	Pittman	Sterling
Beckham	Lane	Pomerene	Stone
Bryan	Lewis	Ransdell	Swanson
Chilton	McCumber	Saulsbury	Taggart
Clarke, Ark.	Martin, Va.	Shafroth	Thomas
Cummins	Martine, N. J.	Sheppard	Thompson
Curtis	Myers	Sherman	Underwood
Dillingham	Nelson	Shields	Warren
Fall	Norris	Simmons	Weeks
Fletcher	Oliver	Smith, Ariz.
Gallinger	Overman	Smith, Mich.
Hughes	Penrose	Smith, S. C.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I desire to announce that the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] is detained from the Senate on official business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Forty-nine Senators having answered to their names, a quorum of the Senate is present. Does the Senator from Alabama desire to address the Senate at this time?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. After the Secretary has read the paragraph I desire to move to strike it out.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read.

The Secretary read the next amendment of the Committee on Finance, which was, under the subhead "Dutiable list," on page 128, after line 14, to strike out:

Group II. Amidonaphthol, amidophenol, amidosalicylic acid, aniline oil, aniline salt, anthraquinone, binitrobenzol, binitrotoluiol, binitronaphthalene, binitrochlorbenzol, benzaldehyde, benzylchloride, benzidin, chlorphthalic acid, cumidin, dianisidin, dimethylanilin, dioxynaphthalene, diphenylamin, methylanthraquinone, metanilic acid, nitrobenzol, nitrotoluol, nitronaphthalene, nitraniline, nitrophenylenediamine, nitrotoluenediamine, naphthylamine, naphthol, napathylenediamine phenol, phthalic acid, phthalic anhydride, phenylendiamine, phenylnaphthylamine, resorcin, salicylic acid, sulfanilic acid, toluidin, toldin, toluylenediamine, xylidin, or any sulfoacid or sulfoacid salt of any of the foregoing, all distillates which on being subjected to distillation yield 5 per cent or more of tar acids in the portion distilling below 200° C., and all other products obtained, derived, or manufactured in whole or in part from the products provided for in Group I, all the foregoing not colors, dyes, or stains, photographic chemicals, or explosives, and not otherwise provided for in this title, and provided for in the paragraphs of the act of October 3, 1913, which are hereinafter specifically repealed by section 402, 15 per cent ad valorem.

And insert:

Group II. Amidonaphthol, amidophenol, amidosalicylic acid, aniline oil, aniline salt, anthracene having a purity of 25 per cent or more, anthraquinone, benzoic acid, benzaldehyde, benzylchloride, benzidine, carbazole having a purity of 25 per cent or more, chlorophthalic acid, cumidine, dimethylaniline, dianisidine, dinitrobenzene, dinitrochlorobenzine, dinitronaphthalene, dinitrotoluene, dioxynaphthalene, diphenylamine, metacresol having a purity of 90 per cent or more, methylanthraquinone, metanilic acid, naphthalene having a solidifying point of 79° C. or above, naphthylamine, naphthol, naphthylenediamine, nitrobenzene, nitrotoluene, nitronaphthalene, nitraniline, nitrophenylenediamine, nitrotoluylenediamine, orthocresol having a purity of 90 per cent or more, paracresol having a purity of 90 per cent or more, phenol, phthalic acid, phthalic anhydride, phenylenediamine, phenylnaphthylamine, resorcin, salicylic acid, sulphanilic acid, toluidine, toldine, toluylenediamine, xylidine, or any sulphoacid or sulphoacid salt of any of the foregoing, all similar products obtained, derived, or manufactured in whole or in part from the products provided for in Group I, and all distillates which on being subjected to distillation yield in the portion distilling below 200° C. a quantity of tar acids 5 per cent or more of the original distillate, all the foregoing not colors, dyes, or stains, photographic chemicals, medicinals, flavors, or explosives, and not otherwise provided for in this title, and provided for in the paragraphs of the act of October 3, 1913, which are hereinafter specifically repealed by section 402, 15 per cent ad valorem.

During the reading of the amendment,

Mr. HUGHES. I ask that the further reading of the paragraph be dispensed with.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks that the amendment ought to be read before it is submitted to the Senate.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Secretary is doing remarkably well, Mr. President. I think he ought to be allowed to conclude.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will continue.

Mr. PENROSE. I object to the Secretary abbreviating the names. I think the paragraph ought to be read in full.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the Senator will call attention to the names abbreviated, the Chair will be very glad to direct the Secretary to read them in full. Otherwise the Secretary will adopt his own style of reading.

After the reading of the amendment had been concluded,

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, this particular paragraph relates to the intermediates in the dye schedule. It is absolutely related to the next paragraph, embracing Group III. I desire to make a motion to strike out both of the Senate amendments, and I think it will save time and save debate if we consider them both together. I ask unanimous consent that that may be done.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the parliamentary aspect of the situation the proposition is to strike out the House text confined to Group II and to insert certain matter which the Senate committee has proposed as a substitute for that. The proposition made by the Senator now would be to submit two amendments to one vote.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I understand that; but I ask unanimous consent that the Secretary may state the amendment embracing Group III and that the amendments may be considered together.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That they may be submitted as a single question?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Unless there is objection, such will be the order. The Chair hears none. The Secretary will read.

The Secretary read the next amendment reported by the Committee on Finance, which was, on page 130, line 22, after the word "chemicals," to insert "medicinals, flavors, synthetic phenalic resin"; and, on page 131, line 1, after the word "indigo," to insert "and colors, dyes, or color lakes obtained, derived, or manufactured therefrom," so as to make the clause read:

Group III. All colors, dyes, or stains, whether soluble or not in water, color acids, color bases, color lakes, photographic chemicals, medicinals, flavors, synthetic phenalic resin, or explosives, not otherwise specially provided for in this title, when obtained, derived, or manufactured in whole or in part from any of the products provided for in Groups I and II, including natural alizarin and indigo, and colors, dyes, or color lakes obtained, derived, or manufactured therefrom, 30 per cent ad valorem.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the group of amendments proposed by the Senate committee.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I am opposed not only to the Senate committee amendment imposing a tax on the intermediates of dyestuffs, but I am opposed to the Senate committee amendment to Group III, fixing a tax on finished dyestuffs, and I am also opposed to the House provision. The first vote, of course, will come on the Senate committee amendment, which places the rate righer than the House provision. If that vote prevails, it will indicate that the Senate desires to keep these paragraphs in the bill, and it will be futile to go further; but if the Senate committee amendments are disagreed to, I will then move to strike out the House provision in reference to changing the present law relating to the tax on dyestuffs.

Mr. President, my objection to this provision is fundamental. It vastly increases the taxes on dyes and dyestuffs far beyond anything that has ever been written heretofore in the law. The House bill greatly increases the tax and the Senate committee amendment increases the amount of tax provided in the House bill. From my viewpoint the enactment of these schedules is a recognition of the principle that we should write a protective tariff to build up American industries. I am not in accord with that view at all. I do not believe that taxation should be used for the purpose of protection.

I have always maintained the doctrine that the only justification for a tax at the customhouse is to raise revenue for the Government. Prior to the European war, when there was an opportunity for dyestuffs to enter our ports there was a fair amount of refenue raised under existing law. If this schedule is not amended, when the war is over and normal conditions again prevail there will continue to be a fair amount of revenue raised; but if you adopt either the Senate amendment or the House bill, after the war in Europe is over the provisions of this bill will cut off importations from abroad and, in my judgment, will destroy all of the revenue that can be raised. In other words, these sections have been written on a basis where they will entirely prohibit importations. That being the case, I do not think those who believe in the fundamental principle of the Democratic Party that taxation should be levied for revenue and not for protection, can afford to vote for this schedule.

I desire the RECORD to show what is the present law and what were the taxes levied under the so-called Aldrich-Payne law of 1909. Some of the raw materials were taxed under the present law and under the Aldrich-Payne law. Under this schedule all of those items have been placed on the free list. I have no serious objection to that. It is true there is a small loss of revenue, but only a small loss of revenue, as the main revenues derived by the Government came from the tax on the finished product. As to the intermediates, there were more of the intermediates on the free list under the Aldrich-Payne law than there are under the present law. The present law put a small tax on the intermediates for the purpose of raising revenue, in no instance higher than 15 per cent. As to the finished product, there was no change in the case of coal-tar dyes between the Aldrich-Payne law and the present law, and the Aldrich-Payne law reenacted the Dingley bill, so that so far as this schedule is concerned in reference to finished products, the present law has been on the statute books since the Dingley law was enacted in 1897, a period of nearly 20 years.

In order that the RECORD may show the existing facts I send to the desk a statement showing the tax under the Aldrich-Payne law on all these items and the tax under the present Democratic tariff law on all of these items, which I will not detain the Senate to read, but ask to have printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHAFROTH in the chair). Without objection, the request will be granted.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, this is no new problem that confronts the Congress of the United States. As far back as the tariff enactment of 1883 the question of putting a high protective duty on dyestuffs was considered. At one time a Republican Congress did enact a high tariff duty in reference to these matters, but it remained on the statute books only a comparatively short time, and a Republican Congress itself repealed the prohibitive tariff rates that it had enacted and wrote in their place tariff duties that produced a reasonable amount of revenue. When the Committee on Ways and Means met to consider the revision of the tariff in 1909, gentlemen interested in the manufacture of dyestuffs in this country came before the committee and asked for an increase of their rates, though not an increase that was comparable with the increases written in this bill. A comparatively small increase of rates was asked for at that time, and yet a Republican committee and a Republican administration refused to increase these rates on dyestuffs in a bill that was being enacted, and wrote the highest tariff schedules that have ever been written on the statute books in this country. Again, when it fell to the lot of the Democratic Party to administer the customs laws of this country, these same gentlemen interested in the manufacture of dyestuffs came before the Ways and Means Committee. Did they ask for a raise? No. They stated that if we left the rates of the Aldrich-Payne tariff bill unamended they would be satisfied, and we left them. This is one of the paragraphs in the tariff law where a Democratic Congress did not cut the rates. They left the Republican rates of duty, because they found on investigation that they were not prohibitive rates; they were reasonable rates, and they were producing a fair amount of revenue. If my recollection serves me right, the revenue produced from this schedule amounted to between two and three million dollars to the Government of the United States, and that revenue, it is proposed now by a Democratic Congress, to abandon and throw away.

It is true that at that time the manufacturers of dyestuffs stood alone; that the great textile industry of this country was before the Ways and Means Committee demanding and petitioning that the items embraced in this schedule should be put on the free list so that they could get their raw material cheaper. The Democratic committee, not legislating for special interests, but legislating for the interests of the whole Government, declined to accede to their demand to put these items in the dye schedule on the free list, but left on the statute books the rates of the Aldrich-Payne bill as far as the finished product was concerned, and allowed the Government of the United States to derive that additional revenue.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do.

Mr. THOMAS. I should like to ask the Senator if it is not true that when the Payne committee was considering the bill which is known as the Payne-Aldrich law, a similar petition, protesting against the putting of duties upon dyestuffs, was made by the users of dyestuffs?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. My recollection is that that statement is correct, although I do not recall it as definitely as I do the other proposition; but I am satisfied that the Senator is correct in his statement. In fact, in looking at the face of the paper that I have in my hand I have convincing proof that the statement of the Senator from Colorado is absolutely true. I find in the hearings held before the Ways and Means Committee on January 14 and 15, 1916, on the subject of establishing the manufacture of dyestuffs in this country, that on page 67 the following petition was inserted at that time. It bears date of Washington, D. C., December 20, 1908, just prior to the enactment of the Aldrich-Payne bill, and reads as follows:

COMMITTEE ON WAYS AND MEANS,
Washington, D. C.

GENTLEMEN: Your memorialists, cotton manufacturers, consumers of coal-tar dyes for the coloring of various cotton fabrics, the largest consuming industry of coal-tar dyes in this country, respectfully submit:

(1) We desire to protest against any advance in the rates of duty on coal-tar dyes or colors under section 15 of the present tariff on the ground that such advance would (a) increase the cost of manufacturing colored cotton goods in the United States, (b) increase the price to the consumer in the United States, (c) in the case of export trade, an advance in the cost of any of our raw materials adds to our burden and minimizes our opportunity to compete with foreign cotton manufacturers in foreign markets.

The list of signers of this petition is long. It is signed by the leading manufacturers of this country. I will ask leave that the names may be printed instead of my reading them.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

The names are as follows:

Amoskeag Manufacturing Co., F. C. Dumaine, treasurer, Manchester, N. H.; Hamilton Manufacturing Co., Franklin D. Williams, assistant treasurer, Lowell, Mass.; Pacific Mills, Edwin F. Greene, treasurer, Lawrence, Mass.; Massachusetts Cotton Mills, Edward Lovering, treasurer, Lowell, Mass.; Merrimack Manufacturing Co., Herbert Lyman, treasurer, Lowell, Mass.; Cocheco Manufacturing Co., H. De F. Lockwood, treasurer, Dover, N. H.; American Printing Co., B. H. Borden, treasurer, Fall River, Mass.; the United States Finishing Co., J. H. Wright, president, New York; the Apponaug Co., J. H. Wright, president, Apponaug, R. I.; Garner & Co., Oscar Hutley, vice president, Pleasant Valley, N. Y.; Passaic Print Works, Edward E. Poor, treasurer, Passaic, N. J.; Arnold Print Works, W. A. Gallup, treasurer, North Adams, Mass.; Windsor Print Works, D. A. Russell, general manager, North Adams, Mass.; Renfrew Manufacturing Co., Ira S. Ball, assistant treasurer, Adams, Mass.; Queen Dyeing Co., R. J. Horton, treasurer, Providence, R. I.; S. H. Greene & Sons Corporation, Francis W. Greene, treasurer, Riverpoint, R. I.; the Aspinook Co., L. Johnson, treasurer, Jewett City, Conn.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Here are the leading manufacturers of this country. The men that ought to know, the men whose business it is to know, came before the Payne committee of the House of Representatives and stated that if you should increase the tax on these dyestuffs the result would be as follows:

First. To increase the cost of manufacturing colored cotton goods in the United States. Does a Democratic Congress desire to increase the cost of manufacturing colored cotton goods in the United States? Not if it intends to live up to the principles of the Democratic Party.

Second. To increase the price to the consumer in the United States. That is what these great manufacturers told the Payne committee in 1908, that if you made an increase—not this enormous increase, but even a moderate increase—it would increase the price of cotton goods to the consumers of the United States. Do my colleagues on this side of the Chamber desire to take the position that it is the duty of the Democratic Party to increase the cost of cotton goods to the consumers of America?

Third. It is stated that "in the case of export trade an advance in cost of any of our raw materials adds to our burden and minimizes our opportunity to compete with foreign cotton manufacturers in foreign markets."

Necessarily so. The great cotton-producing countries of the world have had dyestuffs free. Germany manufactured them in her own market, and necessarily did not pay a tariff duty to secure them. England, the great manufacturer of cotton goods of the world, admitted them free of duty and did not burden her industries with taxation. We are attempting to enact legislation to-day to extend our foreign trade and build up our foreign markets. These men who are in the business have told you that this enactment of increased duties would be a burden on the development of their markets. They have said that it would result in narrowing the opportunity of the American textile manufacturer to seek markets for his surplus production beyond the sea. Is it in accord with Democratic policies to enact a tariff duty that will tie the hands of our manufacturers and prevent our opportunity for increasing our export trade?

Of course, I recognize the fact that it is said that it is necessary to do this to meet an emergency. This war in Europe has been on for two years. The cotton mills of this country have not shut down. They have not ceased their work. The industry not only has not shut down, but it has developed. It has manufactured more goods during this war than it did before the war. It has found larger markets in which to dispose of its goods since the war than before the war. As a matter of fact, the bill itself recognizes that this enormous tax is not being put on dyestuffs to meet war conditions, because there is a provision in the bill which reads as follows:

SEC. 86. That until the termination of the present European war, or until the conditions of importations of the articles therein specified shall have been substantially restored, which shall be evidenced by the proclamation of the President of the United States to that effect, the provisions of Title V of this act shall not take effect or become operative.

Title V is the dyestuffs title.

So, under the very terms of the law that you are asked to enact it is not to take effect until after this war is over. Of course, I understand that the special interests that are seeking legislation at the hands of Congress know that during the existence of this war there will be comparatively a small amount of dyestuffs introduced into this country from abroad, and they only desire and wish the provisions of the bill in regard to this tax to take effect after the war is over. In other words, the war will protect them during its existence, and they are asking the Congress of the United States to write a tariff law that will protect them at the conclusion of the war.

At the conclusion of the war we can go back to our normal markets to get dyestuffs. We will receive our dyestuffs from our normal markets, and we will not need a protective tariff to build up the industry. During the war, when we can not get them, we are not going to be protected by a protective tariff. So the only conclusion you can reach in reference to this legislation is that it is intended to write on the statute books a law that will protect a special industry after the war in Europe is over; in other words, a direct surrender to the principle of a protective tariff.

I know it will be said that by writing the bill in this form you will encourage the building-up of this industry to-day, and get the benefit of it to-day as well as after the war is over. That is not necessary. The industry is building itself up without this legislation. It has been building itself up with enormous profits ever since this war began.

I want to call to your attention the statement of Mr. Schoellkopf, who is the president of the Schoellkopf Aniline and Chemical Works of New York State. You will find his testimony commencing on page 168 of the hearings before the Ways and Means Committee. You will find that he states that prior to the war in Europe his industry was manufacturing 3,000,000 pounds of dyestuffs in this country; that at the time he appeared before the committee, last January, he had increased his production of dyestuffs to 14,000,000 pounds, an increase from 3,000,000 pounds a year to 14,000,000 pounds in two years. The whole testimony as to the facts in reference to this case shows that large industries, with a great amount of capital, have gone into this business, and are already in operation and making dyestuffs for the American people to-day, and are probably making such profits that they will pay for their new plants before this war in Europe is over.

What are we asked to do now? It is not to relieve the market of to-day. That market is being relieved hourly. This enormous increase of production is relieving it. The submarine ships coming from Germany, in a partial way, are relieving it, all of which has happened since the discussion of this question was first taken up. It is not a question of building up an American industry for relief of conditions to-day. You are asked to enact this bill to protect the business of an industry after this war is over; to put enormous taxes on the American people after this war is over that no conditions of to-day or to-morrow or next year will justify. They do not justify it to the Republican Members of Congress.

How can you go to your constituencies and say that, although you denied a prohibitive tariff to this industry when you wrote the tariff act of 1897, and although you denied the same thing to them again when you wrote the tariff act of 1909, you will accept this bill to write a prohibitive tax for these industries for the future? Why, the industry itself does not need these taxes. On pages 192 and 193 you will find a statement by Mr. Schoellkopf, the largest manufacturer of coal-tar dyes at that time in the United States, as to the cost of carrying on this industry in the United States and in Germany, the principal competitor in the world's market.

He stated that the labor cost in the United States to produce 3,000,000 pounds of coal-tar dyes amounted to $116,223 and in Germany to $61,493. He gave the total cost of production in the United States at $692,197 and in Germany at $480,299. Comparing those figures, you will see that the labor cost in the United States, according to Mr. Schoellkopf, in his own factory amounted to 16½ per cent of the cost of production, and that in Germany the labor cost amounted to 12.7 per cent of the total cost of production. The total difference in the labor cost of producing 3,000,000 pounds of coal-tar dyes between this country and Germany was $55,000, which is equalized by a 12 per cent tax on the German cost of production; not on our cost of production, but a 12 per cent tax on the German cost of production.

It is also shown by this testimony that the difference in labor cost—the actual labor wage—in Germany as compared with this country is about one-half—48 per cent—of the American cost.

It is said that you can not carry on this industry in America because of this difference in labor cost, which, according to the figures given by Mr. Schoellkopf himself, a 12 per cent tax on the German imports would equalize.

Under those circumstances let us see what is the amount of tax that these amendments place in the bill. Mark you, under the present law and under the Payne law on the finished product the tax was 30 per cent ad valorem on all importations. The committee has changed it as to the intermediates by changing the tax to 30 per cent and 2½ cents a pound and on the finished product the tax will be 30 per cent ad valorem and 5 cents a pound. You can readily see that on a dyestuff that is of great value a specific duty of 2½ cents a pound or 5 cents a pound will not largely increase the percentage of the tax. There are few dyestuffs, I understand, that will sell for as high as $3 a pound. Add 5 cents to that and it is a very small increase, but that is the dyestuff of the very, very rich. When you come to the dyestuffs of the poor, the dyestuffs of the clothes that the plain people must wear, those dyestuffs sell from 4 cents a pound to 12 cents a pound, and when you put 5 cents a pound duty on a dyestuff that is selling for 4 cents a pound, that alone puts a tax of over 100 per cent. Then add 30 per cent ad valorem and you have it up to 140 per cent tax that you are going to put on the cost of making the clothing for the plain people of America.

I will insert this table in the RECORD, but I will not delay the Senate by reading it all at this time.

I just want to point out a few of the increases in the bill.

Synthetic indigo: The price per pound is 12.7 cents, and in the future if you levy this tax you levy a tax that will amount to 70 per cent ad valorem.

Alizarin: The price per pound is 12 cents, and under the terms of the bill you raise the tax to 70 per cent ad valorem.

Rhodamine B: The cost is 11.9 cents a pound, and under the bill you raise the tax to 72 per cent ad valorem.

Benzo-purpurin: The cost is 11 cents a pound, and you raise the tax to 78 per cent ad valorem.

Direct yellow: The cost is 9½ cents a pound, and you raise the tax to 83 per cent ad valorem.

Direct black: These are common colors. Price, 14.6 cents a pound, and you raise the tax to 64 per cent ad valorem.

Acid black: The cost is 10.8 cents a pound, and you raise the tax to 76 per cent ad valorem.

Malachite green: The cost is 9 cents a pound, and you raise the tax to 85 per cent ad valorem.

Poncean: The cost is 9.9 cents per pound, and you raise the tax to 81 per cent ad valorem.

Here are some cheap colors in common use for common goods. But listen to this:

Victoria scarlet: The cost is 4.6 per pound, and you raise the tax to 138 per cent ad valorem.

Fast red: The cost is 4.3 per pound, and you raise the tax to 146 per cent ad valorem.

I might go on, but I will not take the time of the Senate further. I merely ask that these tables be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the request will be granted.

The tables referred to are as follows:

NOTE.—Fairly large consumption and imports of all the dyes listed above.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Some of the gentlemen on the other side of the House who hold allegiance to the Republican Party believe firmly in the principle of protection. They believe they have a right to levy taxes in the interest of a special industry to build it up, and build it up regardless of the cost to the American people, but there are men on the other side of the Chamber who, although not agreeing with us in our principle that taxes should be levied for the sake of raising revenue for the Government, yet believe that only a reasonable protection should be levied.

According to Mr. Schoellkopf's own statement, and it is in the RECORD—go work it out for yourself—you will find that 12 per cent levied at the customhouse on the German product will equalize the difference in labor cost at home and abroad, and you are asked to come here to-day and by your vote put a tax on the American people and the American industry in many cases ranging from 80 to 140 per cent.

The people of the United States repudiated the Republican Party in 1910 and sent to the Congress of the United States a Democratic House of Representatives, and you know why. You gentlemen on the Republican side of the Chamber know why. You promised them in 1908 a revision of the taxes downward. You did not proclaim yourselves for a tariff for revenue only. You did not say that you would abandon your principle of standing for protection to American industries, but you promised them you would write your schedules downward and cut out some of the prohibitive taxes that were found in the Dingley law. What did you do? When you wrote the law you wrote it upward instead of downward. You increased the rate on the necessities of the American people instead of lessening them.

Have you forgotten the lesson that was taught you? If you have, if nobody else cares to remind the American people of that lesson, I propose to do it.

Now, you are asked by your vote to pass these schedules increasing the rates on the finished product that you had under the Payne law from 30 per cent ad valorem to rates ranging as high as 80 and 140 per cent. Do you think you can justify that position before the American constituencies even if you do believe in protection?

I am not addressing myself to my colleagues on this side of the Chamber, because I feel that when my Democratic colleagues support a schedule of this kind they have simply burned their bridges behind them so far as the schedule is concerned, and have gone horse, foot, and dragoons over to the protective tariff camp of the enemy. I do not believe that they are writing this schedule as a fixed principle of the Democratic Party, but they are yielding to what they believe are conditions. My objection to their position is that any party that surrenders its fundamental principles to conditions of the hour is courting defeat.

Now, what is going to be the effect if you put this act on the statute books? Are you going to get some revenue? Not a bit. You obtained between two and three million dollars' revenue from the law before the war came on. You will get it when the war is over. You are writing this bill to increase the direct taxes on the American people because you have not enough revenue to run the Government. You are putting stamp taxes on them. You are increasing their income taxes. You are taxing corporations. Yet we find a schedule in the bill where you are deliberately proposing to give away to a special industry between two and three million dollars' worth of taxes. Is that in accord with the purpose of the bill? Is that in accord with the principles either of the Republican Party or the Democratic Party. You will not have any revenue after this bill is passed, from this schedule, when the war in Europe is over.

I invite your attention to the hearings before the House committee, on page 187, in which the chairman of the committee asked Mr. Schoellkopf, the leading manufacturer of dyes, this question:

The CHAIRMAN. If this bill becomes a law, how much larger will you make your plant?

Mr. SCHOELLKOPF. We will proceed at once to double it, as I first stated.

The CHAIRMAN. Then you would make about 28,000,000 pounds?

Mr. SCHOELLKOPF. Yes.

Now, turn to page 199.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. From what is the Senator reading?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am reading from the hearings before the Ways and Means Committee of the House last January on this subject. Now, turn to page 199. Dr. Beckers was a witness on the stand at that time, a producer of coal-tar dyes, and the chairman asked him this question:

The CHAIRMAN. But is it not a fact that if this bill were passed you would quadruple your plant and output?

Dr. BECKERS (continuing). I expect to make ten times as much dyestuffs as now.

The CHAIRMAN. Ten times as much?

Dr. BECKERS. Yes, sir; and instead of making 5 per cent, I expect to make 50 per cent.

The CHAIRMAN. That being so, then you and Mr. Schoellkopf would make the entire consumption—the whole 100 per cent.

Dr. BECKERS. Well, I do not know how much he would make.

The CHAIRMAN. He said he would make 50 per cent if this bill were passed.

Dr. BECKERS. I do not know about that, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. If this bill were passed and became a law, and if you expect to make 50 per cent of the entire consumption, and another large manufacturer expects to make 50 per cent of the entire consumption, are we not justified in being sort of afraid that you two gentlemen would be tempted after the war to get together and have some sort of a gentleman's agreement? Would not you two get together and have a sort of dinner, and make a gentleman's agreement and establish the prices which these textile fellows will have to pay for your products?

Dr. BECKERS. Gentlemen, I tell you——

The CHAIRMAN (interposing). Would you not be tempted to do that?

Dr. BECKERS. Gentlemen, in this connection I would like to state that Mr. Herman A. Metz and others, as far as I know, are very fond of good dinners, and I said to you that I expected I could increase my production ten times what it is now. It is now 5 per cent, and if I increased it ten times it would be 50 per cent of the present entire consumption, but I do not know whether I could make 50 per cent of the entire consumption if this bill were passed, because I feel that as soon as the bill is enacted into law a great many concerns will go into that business, giving our concern strong competition.

There it is.

Mr. STONE. Who was the gentleman who was fond of good dinners?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Metz; he is a manufacturer and importer both.

Mr. STONE. Is he one of these concerns over in New York who represent German dyestuffs?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am not aware of it. I know he is a large importer.

Mr. STONE. There are two big concerns in New York City that very largely represent the German dyestuff industry.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am not informed on that question. I can not advise the Senator; but that is neither here nor there.

Whether two or one hundred people were importing dyestuffs, there was competition, there was revenue, but here is a statement of two men as to two plants in this country who tell the committee broadly that they are prepared, if this bill passes, each of them to make 50 per cent of the American consumption of dyestuffs, and the only reason why they doubt whether they will make 50 per cent is as to whether there will be other competitors in the home market behind the tariff wall that will try to take some of the market away from them.

This testimony is not coming from importers; it is not coming from Democrats with revenue proclivities; it is coming from the industry that desires the protection itself. It is coming from this special interest that desires this protection, and they tell you as plainly as words can convey the information that the enactment of this schedule into law means the enactment of a prohibitive tariff law, not a protective tariff, but a tariff law that will prohibit all importations for the future, and give the American industry the absolute and unchallenged control of the American market.

The gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber have proclaimed to the country that if they were in power they would not put this burden of direct taxation on the people, but would write tariff schedules to raise the necessary revenue. Now, this bill comes before them purposing to raise over $200,000,000, and they know that amount must be raised by taxation in the near future to meet the demands of the Government. Yet, when confronted with this schedule, that will admittedly cut off all competition from abroad with the articles it affects, as an evidence of their good faith to the American people, they are prepared to walk up and vote to reduce the taxes at the customhouse over $2,000,000.

Mr. OWEN. If the Senator will permit me, I recently called attention to the fact that the total labor cost of chemicals is only 7½ per cent. In the matter of the colors of which the Senator is speaking, I wish to ask what the total labor cost was.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The total labor cost was testified to by Mr. Schoellkopf, and he is the protective witness in the business. According to his figures, the total labor cost was only 16½ per cent of the cost of production in his line of business, but, according to his own figures, a tariff schedule of 12 per cent would equal the difference in labor cost between this country and Germany. Now, this is coming from the record; it is coming from the man who wants the tax levied—from a protectionist. I have no doubt the figures of the Senator from Oklahoma are more nearly correct than these, but I was putting on the stand their own witness.

Mr. OWEN. Then, what justification is there for this high tax?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. None whatever. A 30 per cent tax will take care of the difference of 12 per cent in labor cost.

Mr. HUGHES. They already have a tax?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. You have 30 per cent tax on the finished product.

Mr. HUGHES. In the Payne-Aldrich law?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. In the Payne-Aldrich law and in the present law.

Mr. HUGHES. A tax on some intermediates?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. In some cases both the intermediates and the raw material are on the free list; but even with the tax on intermediates you still have in every case a differential of at least 12 per cent to protect the labor cost.

Mr. OWEN. It seems to me that that would be a prohibitive tax.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. When the difference in labor cost is only 12 per cent and they are levying taxes that amount to from 80 to 140 per cent, it must be absolutely prohibitive. This dyestuff schedule will make Schedule K of the Payne-Aldrich law blush with shame.

Mr. President, I do not desire to take up a great length of time in arguing other points. The Senate committee has increased the tax on synthetic indigo over the House bill. I have a letter here from a gentleman who is engaged in the business of manufacturing the kind of goods of which overalls are made. Instead of reading his letter and his communication to the Committee on Finance on this subject, I send them both to the desk and ask the Secretary to read them into the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

THE RALEIGH,
Washington, D. C., August 14, 1916.

Hon. OSCAR W. UNDERWOOD,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR UNDERWOOD: Referring to our conversation of this morning, I beg to submit figures relative to the proportionate cost of synthetic indigo to the total cost of the production of the fabric which we manufacture, denims.

In the last normal year, 1913, indigo sold for 15 cents per pound, and on this basis represented 7½ per cent of the total cost of the produced fabric. I believe I left with you a sample of cloth which sells for 18 cents per yard, so that in this cloth under normal conditions, with indigo on the free list, there would be 1.35 cents worth of indigo in each yard.

It is proposed to place an ad valorem duty of 30 per cent, or 4½ cents per pound, and a specific duty of 5 cents per pound on indigo, making a total of 9½ cents, which would increase the normal price to 24½ cents. At this price indigo would constitute 12.25 per cent of the cost of the fabric, or 2.20 cents per yard. You will note that the difference is practically 1 cent per yard, or to be absolutely accurate, 0.95 cents plus.

It takes approximately four yards of cloth to make a pair of overalls, and a like amount to make a shirt or jacket, making due allowance for waste in cutting. On this basis the cost to the laborer who wears these garments would be considerably increased. The initial increase in the cost of manufacture would be 1 cent per yard, or 8 cents for the garments. Before it reaches the wearer it must pass through the cutter, the jobber, and the retail merchant, and with an initial increase of 8 cents, I submit the final increase would be at least between 15 and 20 cents.

To illustrate, if the garments were now costing $1.50, with this additional cost occasioned by the tariff the cost would be between $1.65 and $1.75.

Thanking you for your courtesy in hearing me, I am,

Respectfully,

THOMAS S. BEALL,
Representing the Proximity Manufacturing Co. and White Oak Mills.

Mr. STONE. Will the Senator pardon an interruption?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will ask the Senator, first to allow the Secretary to read the other letter, which explains the one just read, and then I shall be glad to yield.

The Secretary read as follows:

To the honorable the COMMITTEE ON FINANCE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

GENTLEMEN: The Proximity and White Oak Mills during the year 1913 (the last normal year) used 1,350,459 pounds of synthetic indigo in the manufacture of a cotton fabric known as denims. This amount was between one-fifth and one-fourth of the total consumption of indigo by the United States. We are, therefore, vitally interested in the revenue act now being considered by your committee and designated "H. R. 16763."

By section 400, Group III, of this act, indigo is taken from the free list, where it has been for more than 30 years, and placed on the dutiable list with an ad valorem duty of 30 per cent.

Indigo is the best and cheapest blue dyestuff for cotton. Of the total imports of indigo in the United States, less than 5 per cent is used for wool, the remaining 95 per cent being used in the production of cotton fabrics used almost entirely for workingmen's garments and certain cheap fabrics used for women's wear. The wearers of these garments subject them to extremely hard use, requiring frequent washing with strong soaps. It is essential, therefore, that a dyestuff be used in producing such fabrics which will withstand this use and give the consumer the greatest value in the use of his garment. Indigo is the only satisfactory dyestuff for this purpose which has been found.

The United States leads the world to-day in the manufacture of cheap colored cotton goods. One of the principal reasons for this is the fact that the dyestuffs entering into such goods have been on the free list and available to the manufacturer in this country on the same basis as they are obtained by manufacturers in other countries, as England and France.

Our contract for indigo contains the following provision:

"The above price is understood to be based upon existing fiscal conditions. If during the currency of this contract a duty should be imposed upon any merchandise above described, or if any existing duty should be increased or diminished, the price shall be correspondingly advanced or reduced from the date the said duty comes into operation. If the amount of duty should be changed, the buyer shall pay or receive in dutiable funds any difference from the present rates. The buyer shall pay any additional duty caused by advance in market value."

This duty, therefore, must fall directly upon the manufacturer or indirectly upon the ultimate consumer—the workingman.

Indigo is not produced commercially in the United States, and so far as we are advised no American manufactured indigo has been sold. Those who ask that the duty be placed on indigo in order to encourage them in the establishment of the industry only promise an output that will take care of but a small part of the consumption of the United States, possibly 10 per cent. In this connection the attention of the committee is called to the fact that the world's production of indigo is consumed largely outside of the United States, the United States using approximately 15 per cent, while China and Japan alone use more than 60 per cent.

We are therefore confronted with this condition: Congress is asked to take indigo from the free list and place a duty of 30 per cent on it when there is no American indigo industry, and even if such industry be established we would be required to pay the duty on 90 per cent of our consumption coming from abroad in order to protect the 10 per cent manufactured in the United States.

On account of the fact that natural and synthetic alizarin, and dyes obtained from alizarin, anthracene, and carbazol; and natural and synthetic indigo and all indigoids, whether or not obtained from indigo, are cheap dyes, they are excepted from the special duty of 5 cents per pound provided in the first paragraph of section 401. The fairness of this exception is seen when it is noted that many of the other dyestuffs sell for from $1 to $5 per pound, and the addition of 5 cents per pound to such articles would be insignificant, but in the case of indigo, which normally sold for 15 cents per pound (in 1913), such specific duty would amount to 33⅓ per cent.

We understand that the purpose of Congress in considering taking indigo and certain other of the cheaper colors from the free list and making them a part of the dutiable list was to encourage the establishment of an industry for their manufacture in the United States. In the event of the failure of the establishment of such industry, the reason for the duty would cease to exist, and we respectfully submit that the second paragraph of section 401 should be amended by adding "and natural and synthetic alizarin, and dyes obtained from alizarin, anthracene, and carbazol; and natural and synthetic indigo and all indigoids, whether or not obtained from indigo, shall be returned to the free list and shall be exempt from duty."

This suggestion is made upon the idea that your committee shall be determined to impose some duty upon indigo.

We have endeavored to give this subject our best consideration, and have reached the conclusion that the taking of indigo from the free list and placing it upon the dutiable list will result in increasing the cost of the production of cotton fabrics used almost entirely by a class of people least able to afford the advance.

We are filing with your committee samples of indigo-dyed fabrics, showing the class of goods in which it is used, and for the reasons heretofore stated we earnestly protest against the enactment of the bill in so far as it affects indigo.

Respectfully,

Mr. STONE. By whom is the letter signed?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The original paper was signed by the same Mr. Beall who wrote the letter which I have read, and he gave me a copy of the letter.

Mr. STONE. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, Mr. Beall is the attorney of a large manufacturing establishment in North Carolina, which is headed by Mr. Cohen. He said that his establishment made about 50 per cent of all overalls produced in the United States. He made the same argument before the subcommittee having charge of this particular title of the bill, of which I have the honor to be a member, as that which was made in the last paper read at the desk.

This is what I wish to inject into the Senator's observations: The establishment Mr. Beall represented, as I understood his statements made before the subcommittee, enjoys the privilege of a contract with one of the few large concerns in New York, chiefly representing the German manufacturers of dyes, under the terms of which he and his employers will be protected and their interests will be guarded. I could not escape the belief, after listening to him for a good while—I speak now of Mr. Beall, who spoke most intelligently, and, of course, he is a very intelligent man or he would not have been put forward by so important a concern—that there is such a relationship of interest between the North Carolina establishment and this German agency in New York that he could very well afford to protest against any change in the law, at least as applied to indigo.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Of course that is not a material question here or there, but I should like to ask the Senator a question. Does he deny the statement which this man makes, that if you put this tax in this bill on natural and synthetic indigo, it will be a tax of 63 per cent?

Mr. STONE. The antewar price of indigo, as I have said, was about 15 cents per pound, and at the time he was speaking to us, as I recall, it was about 70 cents per pound.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am talking about normal conditions, of course.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I have not any kind of doubt that, if this tax is placed upon this particular form of dyestuffs, it will to some extent increase their cost. I do not know that, but I am speaking as a matter of impression; but whether it does or not, for the purposes of this bill, I favor it. Whether or not the tax would be exactly 63 per cent, I am not at the moment prepared to say. I went into that when we were discussing the matter; and it is within the records; but I have not them before me. I will take the Senator's word for it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Of course nobody can tell what the price of dyestuffs is to-day. My statement was based on normal conditions. If the German dyestuffs are allowed to come in after this war under the conditions which they come in to-day—not immediately after the war—but, in all probability, with the increased competition at home and the same competition from abroad, we can fairly expect that the prices would be about the same as they were before the war came on.

There is no denial of Mr. Beall's statement of facts, that, under normal conditions, if you put this tax on natural and synthetic indigo, you are going to levy upon it a tax of 63 per cent. There will be no denial of his statement of facts that, if you put that tax on these goods, you are going to increase the cost of a pair of overalls to every workman in this country.

The factory cost of production is 8 cents; which, when it is handed down to the workman, means 15 to 25 cents for each pair of overalls. There is no denying that. Are you prepared to say that you are going to make the American people pay that enormous tribute to one industry, when, as a matter of fact, the only witness who was called before the committee in behalf of this increase, stated that even the tax provided in this bill was not high enough to suit him, and that he would not go into the business unless we raised it still higher? So, if his statement is correct, you will have raised the tax to 63 per cent, and yet not get your industry, because you have none to-day. This tax on natural and synthetic indigo is not to protect an industry in existence in America; it is not here; but you are putting it on the American people to invite some special interests to come in here and build up an industry.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. That is not good Democratic doctrine, however.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It surely is not.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I was very much surprised when I heard the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] making the statement he did.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I was equally surprised, I can assure the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I have been in public life with that Senator for about 20 years, but I never before knew that he would use the instrumentalities of the Government and its taxing power for the sake of stimulating production.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am not only surprised at my Democratic friends on the committee, but I shall be surprised if the Democratic side of the Chamber is willing to adopt this schedule, and if even the progressive Senators in the Republican Party are willing to vote for it, because you are trying to cut off revenue in order to establish a prohibitive tax that has not been rivaled by any schedule in a tariff bill except the noted and condemned Schedule K of the Payne-Aldrich tariff bill.

This industry amounts to only twelve or fifteen million dollars a year out of the great productive industries of this country turning out $20,000,000,000 worth of products a year. It is a mere drop in the bucket. If you will look at it merely from the dollars and cents standpoint of one industry, it amounts to very little; but it is the principle involved. Where is the legislative branch of this Government marching to? Is it maintaining the principle that we fought for in the tariff bill of two years ago, or are we going backward, and going to adopt the principles of the Payne-Aldrich tariff bill? Why should we abandon our principles? What is the occasion of our abandoning our principles?

I compared some days ago, in a speech before the Senate, the amount of imports with the American production for the months that the present law was on the statute books prior to the breaking out of the European war, and conclusively showed that the great industries of this country were not being threatened by a deluge of importations from abroad. The same thing is true to-day.

I want to call your attention to the free and dutiable imports during the fiscal years ending June 30, 1913, and June 30, 1916. Importations of crude materials for use in manufacturing increased from 1913, the last year of the Republican tariff, to the present year, $319,000,000. That represents the total importations of crude materials for use in manufacturing. Did not that enable our manufacturers better to build up their business? It was not a tax on the American people to bring those importations in, but they served to uplift American industry and manufacture. The importation of foodstuffs increased $40,000,000 in that time, that is, foodstuffs in crude conditions. Manufactures of foodstuffs increased $115,000,000. Is there anybody objecting in these times to giving the American people an opportunity to get cheaper food abroad, when the prices of food are soaring higher and higher every day? Those are the principal importations.

But it is said we must protect the manufacturers of this country. Listen to this: Importations of manufactures for further use in manufacturing have increased only $10,000,000, and manufactures ready for consumption have only increased $95,000,000, making a total increase of manufactures of only $110,000,000, out of billions of dollars of production. The importations under the head of "miscellaneous" at the customhouse increased to a little over $3,000,000, making a total increase of all kinds of only $384,000,000, less than the normal increase from year to year under Republican tariff schedules.

Mr. President, I want to ask my Democratic colleagues why should we do this thing? Why should we abandon our principles, reverse the engine, and start backward? You may tell me that the present law was not written on scientific principles. No; it was not written on scientific Republican protective principles, and was not intended to be so written.

The present tariff law taxes some raw materials; it taxes some finished products; it taxes some intermediate products; and one item is not adjusted with reference to others all the way through. Why? Because it was not intended in the present tariff law, as it was not attempted by the Republicans in their tariff acts, to build up under the Republican principle of protection, the dyestuff industry. This tariff provision of the pending bill is written on scientific principles. Mr. Aldrich, Mr. Dingley, and Mr. Payne, with all their ability to take care of the manufacturing interests of this country, never exercised greater ability and ingenuity in writing a tariff schedule according to the scientific principles of Republican protectionism than has been exhibited in the preparation of this schedule. What has been done? The schedule has been written for a special interest, for the special interest that is asking for it.

How is the result to be accomplished? In the first place, there has been incorporated in this bill that abomination of taxation, a compound duty. Why is that an abomination of taxation? Because under a compound duty the high tax is always placed on what the poor have to buy, and the small tax on what the rich have to buy. An ad valorem duty may be justified in this instance, because that always appears to be a very good Democratic tax. Even the Democratic Party could sometimes justify a specific duty to be placed on some item to prevent smuggling, as, for instance, a duty of so many cents a pound on sugar; but when the duty is compounded by saying that it shall be 30 per cent ad valorem and 5 cents a pound—an ad valorem and a specific duty added together, it is apparent that if the value of the product is very high the specific duty does not increase the ad valorem rate very much; but if the price of the product is very low the specific duty falls with a great burden on it.

Just as I pointed out here, the cheap dyes in this schedule, employed in manufacturing the goods used by the poor people, carry a tax of from 80 to 140 per cent; but when we reach the class of dyestuffs bought by the very rich, the amount of the tax is only increased 2 or 3 per cent. That is a scientific adjustment of duty from a Republican protection point of view. In this instance the schedule has been made thoroughly scientific. It gives the manufacturer free raw material by taking all taxes off. The people do not get the benefit of that; only a special interest gets the benefit of that free raw material. Then, there is placed an increased duty on the intermediate product that is partially manufactured, and then the specific duty is doubled on the finished product. It is thoroughly scientific from a protection standpoint; but whoever heard of the Democratic Party writing a thoroughly scientific protective tariff bill? That party writes tax laws for revenue purposes. There may sometimes result an incidental protection; but surely when for more than 30 years the Republican Party did not see it necessary to increase the taxes in this schedule or write a scientific protective tariff provision affecting the dye industry, why, after this length of time, should we take it up, when we actually need revenue, when we are badly in need of revenue to support this Government? Under this bill we will cut off between two and three million dollars of revenue when the war is over.

In closing I merely wish to say a few words to the other side of the Senate. You have always recognized that you could not put high protective duties on everything, because you could not get revenue if you did, and you had to have revenue. So you have exercised your privilege of playing favorites, giving one man the benefit of protection and denying it to another man. Our side of the Chamber has always contended that when taxes were levied they should be broadened out as much as possible. I do not say that we have always been able to do that, but we have moved in that direction and not against it. We have broadened them out so that the revenue features might be magnified and the protective features minimized.

Now, I desire to ask my Republican friends a question. Here is a schedule that has produced considerable revenue in proportion to the magnitude of the industry. Are we going to do the fair thing? Are we going to pursue this policy in the future? If you gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber return to power, are you going to pursue the policy of writing prohibitive tariffs on the statute books because you fear the competition that may arise after the war is over? What will result? You will not get the revenue from the customhouse you have been telling the people of the United States you would get when you do that; but you will destroy all vestige of foreign trade that we may possibly build up. That will be far more true than before the European war. We owed debts in Europe then and had to pay the interest. They had gold in Europe then to pay the debts they owed us. We have largely paid our debts to Europe, and we have accumulated the surplus gold of the world. We can not send our goods abroad without getting pay for them, and I should like to know how they are going to pay when the war is over if we do not let them ship some goods into America. If you are going to adopt the policy of raising a Chinese wall of tariff exclusion on all schedules, how do you expect to get paid for what you are shipping abroad now?

Here is a fair example: We had a fairly good export trade with Germany before the war began. We hope to reestablish it when the war is over. One of the things with which Germany could pay us for our exported goods was dyestuffs. You are in this way not going to protect an industry that existed before the war. That industry was running in its way, and had been running for many years, not largely controlling the market, but it was not being destroyed, with a 30 per cent tax; but you are seeking by this bill to go out and build up an industry so that nothing can come in. Therefore you close the gate to that amount of export trade.

Just think what you are doing in the case of synthetic indigo. No American industry has been established in synthetic and natural indigo up to this hour. You want to establish it. You are going out deliberately and imposing a tax of 63 per cent here to build it up; and what will be the result? You are going to destroy the opportunity of somebody else to pay for what you are already making at home by bringing in this indigo. Is that sound finance? Is it sound business? Are you not tearing down established industries in America, the ones that are already established and in the field, so far as their developing their foreign trade is concerned, when you say that you are going to build up industries all along the line in this country, so that even the few imports that can come in here now and pay for your export goods can not come in in the future?

Why, Mr. President, it is a false theory; it is a misconception of the building up of American industry; and, in my judgment, it is an absolute reversal of the principles of the Democratic Party and a denial of its pledges to the American People.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President, I have never found it necessary to differ with my distinguished and warm personal friend from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] on a matter of theory. So far as my own mind is concerned, I am able to differentiate the pending legislation from legislation heretofore passed by the Democratic Party without violating any Democratic principle or Democratic theory, as I understand it. In the language of a famous Democrat, I might say that this is a condition that confronts us, and not a theory. We are frankly attempting to meet a situation such as no Democrat and no one else ever thought he would be called upon to meet.

Surely the Senator from Alabama does not contend that he is any more an upholder of radical revenue doctrines than the dominant governing party in England. Yet we see England, the high priest of free trade—England, which has been made great and powerful by its refusal to assent to the ordinary narrow doctrine of restriction of trade—abandoning overnight that policy to which heretofore she has been absolutely wedded, and to which she points, and justly, I think, as the reason for the overwhelming influence and wealth that she has obtained. Because of the same condition that confronts us—a great European war in which she happens to be engaged, while we are not, but which is no closer to her from an economic standpoint than it is to us—she abandons her revenue position, and not only adopts a tariff-for-revenue policy, not only adopts a restricted-trade policy, but stops trade of all kinds in certain goods, and threatens that after this war is over, if she and her allies are successful, the old conditions will no more obtain.

The Senator from Alabama knows that as well as I, and yet he ventured to prophesy what would happen after this war is over. I venture to say to him now that neither he nor any other man can safely prophesy what the situation will be after the European war is over. We have no right to presume that the chemical industry or the dyestuffs industry, when the European war is over, will return to the basis on which it rested before the war opened. We have not any right to presume that the conditions which will confront us then will be the same as the conditions that confronted us before August 1, 1914. How can any man say what the result of this great struggle is going to be? How can any man say what effect the success or nonsuccess of one side or the other is going to have upon the relations that exist between the various nations of the world? It seems to me it is absolutely idle for one to venture into that realm.

We do know this: We know that dyestuffs are important to our people. We know that a cry went up from one end of this country to the other when they were suddenly shut off. We know that for months and months we expected the textile business to be paralyzed. We know that by extraordinary efforts and by abandoning a great many colors and dyes and tints and shades and by forcing people to wear that which they did not want to wear we have kept the business going; and we know that there are men who are willing to go into this business, just as the United States Government decided that it should construct a nitrate plant. Why? Because it did not want to be dependent upon Chile or any other nation whose commercial relations with us might be disturbed at any time, but that it wanted to be dependent upon itself, so far as that very important commodity is concerned.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

Mr. HUGHES. I yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I should like to ask the Senator from New Jersey if he expects, by these duties and taxes, to stimulate the production of dyestuffs in the United States?

Mr. HUGHES. I do; yes, sir.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Is that the purpose of the tax?

Mr. HUGHES. The purpose of this tax is to encourage this industry in the United States. There is no question about that. I can be absolutely frank and candid with the Senator. Of course the Senator knows that as well as I do. It was introduced in the House and passed in the House because this country was absolutely prostrate, so far as these chemicals were concerned, and it is to-day. The 150 tons of highly concentrated dyes which came on the Deutschland are not a drop in the bucket, so far as the needs and requirements of this country are concerned.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I am not surprised at the Senator's candor. He is always candid, and, of course, he is intelligent enough to discuss that subject with frankness; and yet I have heard so often from the lips of Democratic leaders that you could not stimulate production by taxation that I marvel that the Senator can adjust himself so readily to this doctrine of the "new freedom."

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The new lack of freedom.

Mr. HUGHES. I will venture to say that the Senator never heard that declaration from the lips of any Democrat. It is a fundamental tenet of the Democratic Party that industries can be stimulated. In fact, if the Senator ever heard a Democratic stump speech, he undoubtedly heard at some period of the orator's utterances what is nearly always stated—that the Government can, if it chooses, make it profitable to raise pineapples in Alaska. Everybody knows that.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. No; the Government can not do that. It can not raise pineapples in Minnesota, but it can produce dyestuffs in the United States by a system of protective duties. That is just what our side of the Chamber have contended for for years, and what has been vigorously and forcefully denied by the Democratic side of this Chamber. I have heard this old warrior sitting by my side [Mr. STONE] a hundred times decry the virtue of the kind of doctrine which the Senator from New Jersey is now urging.

Mr. HUGHES. The Senator is mistaken as to that, but that is neither here nor there. No Democrat has ever denied that it was possible to stimulate an industry by protective duties. Of course we know it is possible. Democrats have denied that it was right to do it. Democrats have denied that it was economically profitable to stimulate an unprofitable industry and to tax the people to keep alive an industry which was economically unprofitable to the people. But no Democrat has ever denied that it was possible, by tariff duties, to rear an unprofitable and uneconomical industry and to foist it on the people by means of tariff taxation.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, if the Senator will indulge me, he has not been here as long as I have, but I think he has been here long enough to remember that our attempt to produce sugar upon American soil, that would make the consumers of sugar independent of a foreign supply, by taxation, has been derided over and over again by those on the Democratic side in this House and the other, and wherever Democratic spokesmen were giving their views to the electorate.

Mr. HUGHES. And it was derided by me as much as anybody; but still, as I said before, that has absolutely nothing to do with the proposition that the Senator attempted to lay down.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Well, that is one illustration——

Mr. HUGHES. I do not want to enter into a general tariff discussion with the Senator, because I want to hurry on. Nobody else wants to enter into a general tariff discussion and nobody wants to hear the Senator air his well-known views on the subject of protection, either. I will take the liberty of saying that.

Without any personal reference to anybody at all, and without any reference, of course, to the gentleman whose letter was sent up to the desk, I want to say that while figures do not lie, liars can figure. A letter was handed to the Senator from Alabama which, with the trustfulness and innocence which is so characteristic of him, he adopted and sent to the desk and had read, in which the author of the letter figures out, according to a method of mathematics eminently satisfactory to him, that the proposed increase of the duty on indigo would cause an increase of the cost of indigo so as to cause a corresponding increase of something like 8 cents on a pair of overalls, which one Senator says would result in an increase of about 25 per cent when the overalls reach the ultimate consumer—a method of figuring which left me absolutely astounded and showed me how possible it was for protected manufacturers to convince Republican members of the Finance Committee of the Senate and the Ways and Means Committee of the House that they needed high rates and that they ought to receive them.

The same gentleman appeared before our subcommittee, and on cross-examination by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS], the increase which he states in his letter, as I understood it, to be 8 cents, he reduced to 2¼ cents. I have not attempted to figure this out at all. I have had somebody figure it out for me, however, and I got it down to one cent and three-quarters on a pair of overalls. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] got this gentleman down to less than 1 cent a yard. The same gentleman who wrote this letter came in before our subcommittee and gave us the benefit of his information.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. He was figuring on 8 yards at 1 cent a yard, which would be 8 cents.

Mr. HUGHES. But he said 4 yards, and he has given the total cost and not the increase. Four yards is what he said was the amount of cloth necessary.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I know; but in this letter he is figuring on the whole suit of overalls, not merely the overalls themselves—the pants and jacket both.

Mr. HUGHES. Then that would not agree.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. It reads all right, only the Senator from New Jersey will not wear the jacket.

Mr. HUGHES. Taking his figures either way, you can not make them come out correctly, although I do not pretend to be much on figures; but we did our best to find out the facts from him, and nobody can reconcile the letter he wrote with the statement he made to the Senator from North Carolina.

The Senator has read some startling figures here with reference to these rates, calculated to make the individual hairs of the Democrats who listened to them stand on end; but he calmly assumes that the condition which existed before the war is going to return as soon as the war is over, or is here now. I sent a telegram to one of the gentlemen whom he made his witness here this afternoon, and asked him to send me some prices. Among the prices that he sends me is direct black at 75 cents a pound, which the Senator in his figures quotes at 14 cents a pound. Now, is there any use in the Senator from Alabama and myself standing here and seriously discussing a proposition before this body when we can not get any closer to our fundamental figures in the basis of the discussion than the difference between 14 and 75 cents?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If my friend from New Jersey will yield for just a moment——

Mr. HUGHES. Yes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I call his attention to the fact that this part of the bill is not to take effect during the war and the war prices, but it is to take effect after the war. When I say the presumption is that the prices that existed before the war will return, or that there will be an approximation to their return, of course I am not figuring on prices to-day, which are absolutely abnormal.

Mr. HUGHES. Yes; they are absolutely abnormal, as the Senator says, and yet it does not lie in the mouth of any human being alive to say that they will ever be any different or that these prices will ever be normal again. We are dealing with the situation as we find it; and we find this gentleman, who the Senator says is in a position to manufacture for within 12 per cent of what it costs the German manufacturers, charging and receiving $1.75 for a commodity which the Senator selects as one of the instances why this part of the bill should not be passed, and he bases his reasons on a price of 14.6 cents. So that he produces, to the horror and amazement of the Members who are listening to him, a rate of 64 per cent ad valorem, while the rate based on the price of the commodity as it is being sold to-day under the provisions of the proposed legislation is 36 per cent.

Another one is direct yellow. The Senator carries it at 9 cents a pound. The Senator could make more money than has been made in this country in a great many years if he could buy direct yellow at 9 cents a pound. The price of it happens to be $2.56 a pound, and the ad valorem rate which the Senator figures at 83 per cent is to-day 31.9 per cent under the proposed legislation. Now, why waste time in discussing this subject?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, if my friend will yield, I again call his attention to the fact that it is not being written for to-day's prices. It is being written for the prices that will be resumed after the war is over.

Mr. HUGHES. I have admitted that, and I will admit it again. Yes; the bill is being written for prices after the war is over, although, for all the difference it makes to me, the bill can go into effect to-morrow or immediately upon its passage. It makes little or no difference one way or the other. But I say again—and I will have to say it every time the Senator insists on saying what he has just said—that he does not know, and nobody else knows, whether the prices will ever again be the same as they were before the war started. Why argue that proposition?

I will say to the Senator that we are doing one thing regardless of what the prices are. We are making a schedule that everybody can understand, and that everybody says is fair. The Senator says there will be no importations under it. I will say to the Senator that there are a great many big and powerful importers in this country; there are a great many big and powerful importers who live in my State, and who live not far from me; and not a single importer in the United States of America has complained against these rates. There is not one of them who has not said that if prices do become normal, or when the war is over, and something like normal conditions return, if they ever do, they will still be able to import dyestuffs into this country. In spite of the fact that this legislation may have an adverse effect upon the business of the importers, yet the need is so great that nearly every importer I know of thinks we are justified in making this effort, in this special case, to build up an industry in this country that is so important from so many angles.

As has been pointed out in the hearings, Germany would now be lying prostrate at the feet of her enemies if it had not been for the fact that she had this tremendous industry, hitherto devoted to the arts of peace, which she was able to turn overnight into arsenals to produce the highest form of explosives known to man. For every reason, for a thousand reasons, the members of the Democratic Party or any other party are justified in meeting this emergency like statesmen.

Now, Mr. President, I will call attention to another peculiar thing about this proposed legislation. There is not a European manufacturer with an agency in this country who owns a patented product which is a world monopoly who is sneaking it into this market without paying any duty. There is nothing in this bill that helps the big German cartel controllers to bludgeon an American manufacturer to death. Now I want to say something that will not be so palatable to the gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber. In my judgment, in the title of the Payne-Aldrich bill you might as well have written: "An act to make it impossible to establish a dyestuff industry in the United States of America"; and to a certain and more modified extent I will say that was true of the bill that followed it, and I had something to do with the construction of that bill. I would have written a bill, not substantially like this, but along these lines. The last time we had this proposition up here I had it my way, but when we tried to make it harmonius and symmetrical, when we tried to comb the jokers out of it, when we tried to lay half-way duties on intermediates and full duties on finished products, and so far as possible to make raw materials free, we found that we were met by the textile manufacturers, who were receiving protection to the extent of 25, 30, 40, or 50 per cent in some cases, who insisted that the articles that went into the manufacture of their commodity must be upon the free list.

We found the influence of foreign manufacturers powerful enough to get in behind the strongest textile manufacturers and compel them to come to the committee and force upon them legislation which was not even in their interest, which was not in the interest of the dye industry of the United States, and which in my judgment was not in the interest of the people of the United States. You can have the satisfaction when you are voting for this schedule of knowing that it shields and protects nobody except as he who runs may read.

Every coal tar crude comes into this country free. Every coal tar intermediate pays 15 per cent ad valorem and 2½ cents specific. Every finished coal-tar product pays 30 per cent and 5 cents specific. The dyes that were imported into the United States for the years 1913 and 1914, if they had been imported under the proposed legislation, would have paid 49½ per cent equivalent ad valorem.

If the legislation which is now proposed had been upon the statute books for the years 1913 and 1914, the average rate of duty that those commodities would have paid is 49.5 per cent ad valorem. I want to say that that statement should be modified in this way: Quite a heavy percentage of the dyestuffs that come into this country is made up of indigo, synthetic and natural. Synthetic and natural indigo can be brought in either in the form of a paste or in the form of a powder. If it comes in in the form of a paste it is only 20 per cent indigo.

If it is brought in in the form of powder, it is practically 100 per cent pure. This duty is laid upon a 20 per cent purity indigo paste, and that duty can be brought down to a little more than 31 per cent ad valorem.

There is a reason, and one which should appeal to the Senator, for treating indigo as the other dyes are treated. The Senator, in his argument, states that natural indigo should come in free. Of course, if that is done, it means that synthetic indigo should come in free, because there is no way of telling the difference. If you should put natural indigo on the free list and leave the duty upon synthetic indigo, it would be easy enough to send synthetic indigo to China or India, or wherever the natural indigo is produced, and bring it in. I see that the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] shakes his head. All I can say is that I have the word of the chemists of the Treasury Department, but I will not attempt to put them up against the superior wisdom and judgment of the Senator from Utah. All I can say and know is what they say to me.

Mr. President, I do not think it is necessary for me to say any more on this subject than I have said. This schedule, regardless of the rates, is a fair schedule. In my judgment, importations under it will continue. In my judgment it will still be possible for us to have a competition between the importers and the manufacturers; but it will not be possible for any man to patent a product, have it slapped on nominee into a tariff schedule, bring it into this country free, escaping the payment of the 30 per cent that similar products are called upon to pay, and control this market. Under this schedule you will not find the other anomalous condition of charging a duty of 15 per cent on an intermediate that a dye manufacturer must purchase in order to make a finished product, and then asking him to meet that finished product on the free list.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If it does not interrupt my friend from New Jersey, will he allow me to ask him a question there?

Mr. HUGHES. Yes, sir.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I admit that from a protection standpoint you have written what is called a scientific tax on dyes; but how can you reconcile the fact that you put what I call a 63 per cent tax on indigo with the fact that denims, out of which overalls are made, are on the free list, and entirely untaxed? If you are scientific in what you are doing about these dyestuffs, why do you not carry your scientific action further, and put a tax on denims, which are now on the free list, and in the case of which you are taxing their raw material?

Mr. HUGHES. I do not see why the Senator should complain about that.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am not complaining.

Mr. HUGHES. There is only one manufacturer in the United States who has complained about this schedule; and, understand, the manufacturers are going to pay this increase in rates, because on the Senator's own theory by increasing the tariff we have not given them the right to pass it on to the people. So every manufacturer in the United States, so far as tariff action is concerned, is paying this increased price; and every one of them is willing to do it, except this man from North Carolina. He is the only manufacturer who is complaining; and I come from a city where there are thousands of them.

Mr. STONE. The Senator means, a State where there are thousands of them.

Mr. HUGHES. I mean that my own city, the city of Paterson, has thousands of manufacturers, representing millions of dollars, and every one of them wants this particular title enacted; and every one of them will be compelled to pay the prices which the Senator complains about, if he is correct.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not want to interrupt the Senator; but if there was competition I would yield in the cheap cotton goods, such as denims. No competition comes into this country. I was simply speaking of the logic of comparing these rates.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Democratic members filed a minority report to put indigo on the free list, and out of respect to the Democrats Mr. Aldrich agreed to it, and it has been on the free list for 36 years.

Mr. HUGHES. The foreign makers of indigo may have been able to get some manufacturers to complain to the minority members and impress them with the justice of their cause.

Mr. OVERMAN. Then the Democrats were influenced by foreigners in asking them to put it on the free list?

Mr. HUGHES. The Democrats were influenced and many another Senator was influenced by words and by communications and personal appeals made to us when we were revising the schedule.

Mr. OVERMAN. It had been on the free list for 36 years.

Mr. HUGHES. Of course.

Mr. OVERMAN. And now we ought to do what is right.

Mr. HUGHES. We want to treat them as we treat all the others. We ought not to make fish of one and flesh of the other. There is not a single manufacturer in the United States, as my friend from Alabama says, who has complained about it except one man from North Carolina. The argument was made for him that we are putting a 63 per cent duty on it. Let us see. According to the Oil, Paint, and Drug Report of the United States of August 28, 1916, natural indigo was $3 a pound. So that was less than 31 per cent.

Mr. OVERMAN. But the Senator——

Mr. HUGHES. Let me finish. I am not arguing with the Senator from North Carolina. I am speaking about the provision of the Senator from Alabama. I want to say particularly to the Senator from Alabama there never was and never will be an ounce of natural indigo made in this country, and why should we complain that every ounce that is used should pay a duty of 30 per cent into the United States Treasury? That is a tariff for revenue with a vengeance.

Mr. OVERMAN. If the Senator will pardon me, how much has this rate also been increased over the House rate?

Mr. HUGHES. By a specific duty of less than 1 per cent on the present price.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will state to the Senator that the House bill, I think, carries a 30 per cent tax and the Senate committee added 5 cents.

Mr. OVERMAN. That makes 60 per cent?

Mr. HUGHES. I will not allow the Senator to interject a statement of that kind. It is an absolutely inaccurate statement.

Mr. OVERMAN. I only ask for information. I ask the Senator how much it is.

Mr. HUGHES. According to the price of indigo to-day we have increased it less than 1 per cent.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. And after the war?

Mr. HUGHES. I do not know what the price will be after the war.

Mr. OVERMAN. I will say to the Senator if there was one man who would not make it at the House rate, you have put this in to encourage that one man in the manufacture.

Mr. HUGHES. I say to the Senator that is not so. I am chiefly responsible for urging it, and it was put on the same basis as every other dye.

I could not see then and I can not see now why one selling or manufacturing in the United States should be given a privilege over another. You could not leave that where it was, justly, without changing the rate on alizarin and anthracene and other dyestuffs of similar character.

Mr. OVERMAN. I understand that this rate is in the interest of one man, to make him rich and the balance of the people will pay the tax. This one man will make the indigo. He says he can not manufacture it at 30 per cent, but if you will make it 63 per cent he will put his money in it and manufacture it. Do you propose to make him rich and to make the people pay the money?

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President, I will relieve the Senator's mind by saying that I do not know whom he is talking about. No one man ever communicated with me. I have heard that certain gentlemen said if they got a certain rate, they would make these dyes. That had no influence upon me. I am trying to make the schedule what I believe it ought to be. I can not see any reason for treating one of these dyes in one way and another in another way. Whether that man comes from North Carolina or whether he comes from New Jersey, I know when you put three or four of these cheap dyes to an advantage over others, to that extent you disadvantage the other dyes. That has been the trouble with the Payne-Aldrich law, and that has been the trouble with the modified Underwood law. In my opinion, they should all be treated just alike, and we have treated them all alike. What the Senator from Alabama says is true; the only beneficiary will be the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. President, that is all I care to say on the subject, so far as I am concerned.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, for the last 10 years I have advocated a rate upon dyestuffs that would enable the establishment of that industry in the United States. I have seen industries established and I have seen those same industries destroyed by Germany dumping goods into this country at prices at which the goods could not be manufactured either in Germany or in this country. I have seen dyestuff machinery built and placed in operation and within a few years after I have seen that same machinery thrown on the dump heap.

I have called the attention of the Senate to those conditions many times. I have told the Senate time and time again that the only way the industry could be established in the United States was to protect the product of the industry by a rate of duty that would be high enough to prevent Germany or any other country from dumping their goods into this market, and by so doing destroy the industry, then raise the price, as they have done in the past, higher than it was at the time the dumping began.

If I wanted to take time this afternoon I could recite to the Senate the chemical industries that have been established in the United States, and by so doing the price of chemicals have been lowered until the German chemical combination has decided that the American industry must be destroyed, and it was destroyed. I have seen prices raised to the American buyer after the American industry was destroyed to more than compensate the German maker for all that he lost in destroying the American industry by dumping his products into this country.

There is no necessity of it, Mr. President. That time has passed; and now I am glad to say that I doubt whether there is a single Senator who will not admit that there has been an injustice done our country in not encouraging this industry.

I remember, three years ago, calling attention to an industry in the city of St. Louis that had been making chemicals of what may be termed the higher grade. The Underwood bill became a law, and it had not been in operation six months before that establishment was out of business, the machinery thrown out upon the dump heap, and the building used for other purposes.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I wish to ask the Senator a question for information.

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. How long had they been in existence? How fully had those factories developed?

Mr. SMOOT. It was not a dyestuff industry, it was a chemical industry, as I stated.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I am speaking of dyestuffs.

Mr. SMOOT. No; I spoke of a higher grade of chemicals.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I was interested to know if there were any considerable number of successful producers in this country during the 20 years prior to the passage of the Underwood law.

Mr. SMOOT. I think we had about nine establishments making dyestuffs, but I will say that Germany not only secured the most of our business but secured the greater part of the business of the world.

In fact Germany produces and furnishes to the world over 80 per cent of all the dyestuffs used; and not only that, Mr. President, she has cartels or combinations, and the German Government encourages their formation and operation, and dyestuffs are sold irrespective of cost in any country that undertakes to establish a dye industry, and they simply drive the competing business out of existence.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Did they then put up their prices?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly. Take oxalic acid. We undertook to manufacture oxalic acid in this country and we placed a duty upon it, and oxalic acid was made in this country. At that time the price was around 9 cents a pound, as I remember. Just as soon as the American product was placed upon the market the price began to fall, and it fell until the American manufacturer had to close up, and just as soon as the American factory was closed the price advanced higher than it had been before.

Mr. President, I want to say that if Germany had not established the protective system 30 years ago, if Germany through protection had not built up her industries and her manufacturing concerns, Germany in the present war would have been crushed by England and her other enemies in a very few months.

The Senator from Alabama complains of the rates provided for in this bill, not upon the crude articles, because they are on the free list, but of the rate of 15 per cent ad valorem and 2½ cents per pound specific duty. He complains of the rate of 30 per cent ad valorem and 5 cents a pound specific duty upon the finished product, and he cites an article that used to cost 15 cents per pound to show that the latter rate is too high.

It is the same old argument. You take the very lowest-priced article there is and you figure an average rate of duty upon that article and never take into consideration the 85 per cent of all the other importations, the price of which runs from $1 to $3 a pound under normal conditions.

I admit if the price of coal-tar dyes was only 15 cents a pound and there was a duty of 30 per cent ad valorem and a 5 cents per pound specific duty it would amount to 63 per cent. But, Mr. President, if it was $3 a pound it would be 30 per cent and 1⅔ per cent, which would make 31⅔ per cent instead of 63 per cent.

Then the Senator also undertook to impress the Senate with the statement that it was this class of dyes that was used in the clothing of the poor. Mr. President, indigo is used in the dyeing of denims, the cloth used in the making of men's overalls. I say now that it does not cost more than 1 cent a yard, if it costs that, to dye denims blue. The fact is, the blues used for dyeing cloth for the mass of the people, for the same poor man's family, the clothes that he himself wears, with the exception of his overalls, if dyed blue, is dyed from dyestuffs ranging in price from 50 cents to $3 per pound.

Mr. President, if we are going to establish this industry in this country, I tell the Senate now that the specific rate of 2½ cents a pound on intermediates and 5 cents upon the finished product is not sufficient to protect the industry. Whenever the war is over and things in Germany become normal again it will be easy for the German manufacturers, through their combinations and cartels, to take off 2½ cents a pound from intermediates and 5 cents a pound from the finished product and destroy the industry in the United States if it is ever established.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I ask the Senator if this applies to synthetic and natural indigo?

Mr. SMOOT. It does apply to natural indigo and synthetic indigo. By the way, let me call attention to the fact that natural indigo has been on the free list for 30 years. Natural indigo never will be produced in the United States. It is a product of the earth. Synthetic indigo is made from coal-tar products that answer exactly the same purpose in dyeing that natural indigo does. Nobody wants to dye now with natural indigo if they can secure the synthetic product. It is much simpler and inexpensive to use, and, above all, much cleaner. The alizarins are most used to-day and can be handled more cheaply, and produce a better color, in my opinion. As far as synthetic indigo is concerned, of course, that was not known 30 years ago.

Mr. HUGHES. I think the Senator will agree with me that synthetic indigo was first discovered by one man.

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. HUGHES. And through our tariff laws then existing one man was able to bring it into this country free, when it came into competition with natural indigo and drove it from the market, so that nobody could handle it or produce it.

Mr. SMOOT. Not only was that the case with synthetic indigo, but it was also the case with alizarin.

Mr. HUGHES. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. I believe I have recited what I myself happened to see in Germany at one time. I used to buy a great many coal-tar dyes from Germany. I went to Germany to meet the people with whom I had done so much business. When going through the largest plant in the world I was shown into the chemists' department. Among the hundreds of chemists that were working at that great plant I was shown into a room where I was told that the chemists there had been experimenting for nearly 20 years to produce a dyestuff that would take the place of indigo blue. Our Government used to specify indigo blue for all of its uniforms; every Government on earth used to do the same. These enterprising German manufacturers undertook to find something that would answer the purpose of indigo blue, and yet which would cost less money.

While there I talked with a chemist, and I asked him if he had yet discovered an article that would take the place of indigo blue. He said, "Not yet"; but I was told that those chemists were put into that room with but one instruction, and that was never to give up their investigations until such an article was discovered. No matter how much money it might cost and no matter how long it might take, they were instructed to find something that would take the place of indigo blue.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I yield.

Mr. THOMAS. It is needless to say that the incident which the Senator from Utah has just mentioned carries within itself the secret of German success in dye making and also in dye control all over the world, in countries which have tariffs and in countries which have no tariffs. We may pass all the tariff laws imaginable, but we shall have no dye industry here until we get that German spirit of patience and investigation and success.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I was going to ask what would have been the result if a manufacturer in the United States had 30 years ago undertaken to discover an article that would have taken the place of indigo blue? Why, Mr. President, perhaps he would have worked at it for six months, and if he had been a very patient American he might have worked at it for a year, but at the end of the year he would have said, "Oh, life is too short; I shall not bother further with anything like this." So I say, Mr. President, no matter what rates of duty we place in this bill, unless they are sufficiently high to allow an industry to be established in this country and to maintain itself until it can get upon its feet, we might just as well propose no duties at all.

I say, now, with a specific duty of 2½ cents on intermediates and of 5 cents on the finished product, the industry in the United States will not be established. I do not say that under this bill some of the cheaper lines will not be made in this country, but what I am saying is that a complete line of dyestuffs made from coal tar, so that our users of dyestuffs can depend upon America for what dyestuffs they are compelled to use, will not be made in the United States.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, do I understand the Senator from Utah, who has made a special study of this schedule, to say that the provision of this bill is inadequate to ever establish the dyestuffs industry on a firm basis in this country?

Mr. SMOOT. I have no doubt about it. I say that there are some lines of the industry which may be established.

Mr. GALLINGER. What would the Senator from Utah suggest as to the rates?

Mr. SMOOT. Instead of 2½ cents, I would make it 3¾ cents for intermediates, and I would make a rate of 7½ cents instead of 5 cents for the finished product. I am speaking now of specific rates. If those rates were established, I have no doubt in my mind that the industry might be established in this country, perhaps with the single exception of some of the very finest and highest-priced coal-tar products that are made elsewhere in the world. Perhaps the most delicate shades of pink and the most delicate shades of blue that are made we should not for a few years be able to establish an industry to take care of, but the demand for such colors is so small and their use in this country is so limited that I am not worrying about that; nor would I ask rates so high that they would take care of such, but experience would bring the ability to produce them and time alone would give that experience.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to again interrupt him?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have been importuned to vote for this provision, and have also been importuned to vote against it. I want to ask the Senator if he wishes to disclose his present state of mind—he having made a special study of this matter, which I have not done—whether he is going to vote for the provision or against it?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I want to be perfectly frank with the Senator from New Hampshire and to tell him why he has received protests against the adoption of this provision. The manufacturers in this country have in the past always been against a duty upon dyestuffs, and never did consent to allow more than 30 per cent on the finished product. They were willing to pay that in the past, but at no time have we had a higher rate of duty than 30 per cent upon our coal-tar dyes. I say now that the manufacturers of the United States using dyestuffs have since the European war began been compelled to pay prices that would more than have justified them in supporting a rate of duty in the past that would have enabled this industry to have been established years ago in the United States.

Why, Senators, do you know that many of the dyestuffs have risen in price 1,200 per cent since the beginning of the European war? Do you know that the reds that we use in the printing of our own money have risen from 34 cents to $4 a pound, and that we can not get a sufficient quantity even at $4 a pound?

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me further, I apprehend that the textile manufacturers, some of whom certainly are against this provision, are of opinion that after the European war closes dyestuffs will be reduced in price to a point below what they can be produced for in this country even under a reasonable tariff, but does not the Senator believe that after the European war closes, unless we have some competing industry, that they will be disappointed in their expected reduction of prices on the part of Germany?

Mr. SMOOT. There is no doubt, Mr. President, that if Germany after the war is over controls the dyestuffs industry of the world she is not going to reduce the price until she is compelled to do so. And how will she be so compelled? Japan to-day is not only advancing money to her manufacturers for the establishment of dye industries in Japan, but she is assisting in every other way possible to insure such an industry being established there. England is doing likewise and has abandoned her free-trade policy in relation to dyestuffs. France is doing the same thing. Until competition compels the German manufacturers to reduce the price of dyestuffs the American manufacturers will pay every dollar that the German producers can force out of them, just as they did in the case of the dyestuffs that were landed from the submarine Deutschland about a month ago. There is no question about that, Senators.

So, Mr. President, if we are going to pass a bill having in view the establishment of a dyestuff industry in this country, I want to see a bill enacted into law from which there is a likelihood that something will be developed.

I know there are some manufacturers in this country, particularly the chemists, who are manufacturing low-priced, heavy dye products who are perfectly satisfied with the rates proposed in this bill. They have had the business in the past under the rates heretofore established, and they will have it under the rates named in the pending provision; but they do not constitute a great dye industry in this country; and that is what we want to establish. If we do not succeed in establishing one, I say all success to Japan; I say to England, "success to your endeavors," and I express the hope that France will so solve the problem in her country that some competition will be insured in the production and sale of dyestuffs.

I think our home market is the best market on earth. I can not agree with the position taken by the Senator from Alabama. I understood him to say that our buying dyestuffs from Germany enabled Germany to buy our products and it was a mutual advantage, and this was the only way trade between the countries could be maintained. I can not agree with the Senator. Foreign countries purchase from us just what they are compelled to and no more.

I wish to say, Mr. President, that so far as I am concerned, I would like to see established in this country all kinds of industries; but if the contention of the Senator from Alabama is correct, we ought to entirely confine our activities in this country to raising cotton, wheat, and other agricultural products, and send those products to wherever people may want them, taking in return their manufactured products in payment for same.

Mr. President, I would not only favor raising our wheat and our cotton, but in connection with the agricultural industry I would favor the establishment of manufacturing concerns in sufficient numbers to produce all the goods required by the people of this country and make within our own borders every dollar's worth of goods consumed by the American people, if it were possible to do so. If that policy were followed, it would not be long until we would be the wealthiest people on this earth.

Mr. STONE. We are now.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Missouri says we are now, but we were not a few years ago.

I desire to say, Mr. President, that if the war continues for two more years, as I said in a short statement here the other day, the people of America will virtually control the finances of the world for many, many years to come.

Mr. President, there will be no effective dye industry in this country if the Germans, who have been furnishing us more than 80 per cent of all the colors we consume, can prevent it. The recent visit of the undersea merchantman Deutschland is evidence of that fact. That vessel brought principally dyestuffs, and other such vessels are promised with similar cargoes. The agitation in this country, owing to the high prices and scarcity of dyes, for the establishment of the industry has been an incentive for the Germans to get their dyes here to meet the demand even while the war lasts. This is only one of many incidents emphasizing the need for adequate protection if we are to have a satisfactory dye industry, and also make ourselves able to produce all the explosives needed in case of a war. The House of Representatives passed the bill providing protection for the dyestuff industry three days after the German undersea vessel arrived. But the rates fixed in that measure are inadequate, and for that reason will be useless. They were chiefly instrumental in showing the hollow pretense of the Democratic Party in declaring in its national platform time and again that a protective tariff is unconstitutional. Holding that view, despite the decisions of the Supreme Court to the contrary, the President has maintained it with great earnestness, yet the party admittedly adopts what it calls protective rates on a part of the dyes for which we have been dependent upon a foreign nation.

If the Democrats should control the elections in November the dye industry would lag just as it has done heretofore. There would be no reliance on the promise to help establish the industry in view of the defective legislation and the party's free-trade record. Effective work in any line can not be expected from a person who does not believe in the work he is undertaking. For that reason effective protective duties are not provided in this bill to establish or maintain the dye industry. In this case we have the evidence of 10,000 chemists and other experts to that effect.

What is known as the Hill bill, introduced in the House, provided for a specific duty of 7½ cents per pound on the finished dyes, and 3¾ cents per pound on the intermediates, in addition to a 30 per cent ad valorem duty on the former and 15 per cent on the latter. Those rates were approved by the committee appointed by the American Chemical Society and by President Herty of that organization, who is a resident of Chapel Hill, N. C., and by Dr. Bernard C. Hesse, a well-known free trader of New York; H. A. Metz, a German and American manufacturer and a former Democratic Member of the House, and many other representative men in this industry. But instead of adopting those rates the bill passed by the House provides for the ad valorem duty, but the specific rates were reduced 33⅓ per cent. The committee appointed by the chemists approved the rates in the Hill bill by stating that they "are the lowest at which a self-contained, complete, independent coal-tar chemical and dye industry can be created in this country, and at the same time which offers a legitimate incentive to capital for a legitimate effort to produce these goods in this country." Mr. Metz, himself a German manufacturer, asserted:

> On anything less you will be off, anyway. I do not know whether that is high enough

Dr. Hesse, whom the New York Times (Democratic) says is president of the American Chemical Society, and who is an open and an avowed free trader, in a recent address in New York before the Dress Fabrics Buyers' Association said:

> The United States has a sufficient supply of coal-tar materials of suitable quality to produce all of its own requirements of coal-tar dyes, if it so chose to use them, and it has domestic access to all the needful auxiliary chemicals except sodium nitrate, in which respect it has been dependent upon Chile, and in that regard has been in the same position as practically every other nation. To-day we are in a most favorable position in these respects—a better condition than ever before. The coal-tar dye industry was started in England and France fully four years before it was started in Germany, but in recent years Germany has made 90 per cent of the coal-tar dyes consumed in the world.

That has been the result of the protection given to this industry in Germany, which has built up a large and valuable trade with other countries in the matter of dyes. In 1913 Germany had 22 large establishments making coal-tar dyes. The dividends declared in 191[illegible] by 21 of the German manufacturers amounted to $11,600,000. The manufacturers' value of all coal-tar dyes consumed in the United States in normal times is about $15,000,000. One great advantage in this industry is that these manufactories can be used for the production of explosives in case of war, which has been of enormous advantage to Germany. Her opponents in the existing war were at a great disadvantage at the start because of their inability to obtain the requisite explosives for use in the war. The coal-tar dye industry pays higher dividends in Germany than any other branch of the chemical industry, and Germany has sold these dyes to 33 outside countries. We had a tariff rate in 1882 that led to the establishment of nine coal-tar dye manufactories in this country, but the Democrats in 1883 reduced those rates so as practically to wipe out the industry in this country. Since that time we have never had an effective tariff on these dyes because of the opposition of the manufacturers who used the dyes. The war in Europe has furnished an effective lesson as to the great folly of that course. There appears now to be a probability that something will be done to establish the industry fairly within the United States. If it is not done by this Congress, I think we will have a Congress following this one that will take the necessary action. The present rate of duty is 30 per cent, and that on a part only of the dyes made from coal tar. Dr. Hesse in his speech in New York said:

> The Underwood law has not created a dye industry; the Hill bill would probably create an industry, if enacted into law, that would produce not only coal-tar dyes and explosives but also many other things obtainable from coal tar and other like materials, and anything less than the Hill rates is not likely to lead to any substantial industry. With this view the most experienced domestic coal-tar dye makers agree. Protection in order to protect this industry must protect it all the way round. The Hill bill does that; the Kitchin bill does not. Unless we protect the coal-tar dyes and chemical industries in this country, we are not going to have any such industries. The Hill bill gives the dye maker what he says he needs; the Kitchin bill does not. If we really want an American coal-tar dye industry and all it brings and may bring with it, why should we thus haggle? The dye-using interests insist that something must be done to establish this industry, but those interests have been responsible for the disastrous rates since 1883. It is not time for a half-hearted measure. Either we must have the substantial whole of the industry or we will have nothing of value in time of stress. The longer we delay in getting this industry the more difficult the task will become. We can if we will make just as good qualities as any one, but we can not do it unless we have the opportunity to acquire the experience. The difference between the effective rates and the rates in the Kitchin bill, so far as the cost of finished fabrics is concerned, can not be great, hardly ever large enough to pass along.

Mr. HILL stated in the House that $42,000,000 for the development of this industry had been promised in case sufficient rates were established. France, Japan, England, and Russia have already taken effective measures to establish the industry in those countries, but we are quibbling here over 2½ cents a pound. One-thirtieth of 1 cent per yard is said to be the ultimate cost to the final consumer of satisfactory rates to establish this industry.

This country has lost more because of the German monopoly since the European war began than all of the extra costs that could possibly accumulate in a century by the establishment of effective rates. The British Government has put $15,000,000 into the establishment of the industry in that country. Japan has guaranteed 8 per cent profit on any Japanese capital invested in the business. We have voted at this session of Congress $20,000,000 of Government money to make fertilizers and nitrates, $11,000,000 to build an armor-plate plant, and large sums for other such purposes, but the party in power refuses to give satisfactory rates to establish this very important industry, and we will, if the Democratic Party has its way, continue to be dependent on Germany.

A committee representing the manufacturers of dyestuffs and coal-tar intermediates and also representing 30 different associations of consumers of finished dyestuffs have called attention to the fact that the House bill cuts out from the special 5 per cent duty "natural and synthetic alizarin and dyes obtained from alizarin, anthracene, carbazol, and natural and synthetic indigo and all indigoids, whether or not obtained from indigo." These excepted colors constituted 27 per cent in value of all the dyes imported from Germany in 1913. The bill provides that the special duty shall cease unless an American industry shall have been built up in five years' time capable of furnishing 60 per cent in value of the country's consumption. This arbitrary reduction of 27 per cent of the industry will make the attainment of the 60 per cent of the total a practical impossibility. The classes of colors excepted will be of great advantage to foreign competitors. The importation of those colors increased nearly three times in quantity in three years.

The European manufacturers can further develop those colors so as to provide practically all the colors required for our consumption. Indigo is also included in that exception, and it is by far the most important single color imported. This committee asserts that "no one would be tempted to invest money in making aniline colors so long as he could be exposed to competition by another group or class of colors paying a much lower duty." Twenty-seven per cent of our entire consumption cut off by being left without the benefit of any specific duty leaves it to Germany to sell us only 13 per cent, and then the President has got to order the suspension of all the duties. That is the way this bill was made up and passed by the other branch of Congress. It is very evident that the industry will never be established in this country to any large extent under the bill as it passed the House. When the war ends Germany will have plenty of dyes to unload in this market. As she consumes only a fraction of the dyes she produces, she could sell the part used at home at very low prices and thus escape any charge of dumping under the faulty provisions of this bill. The Democrats proceed on the policy of going on record as verbally in favor of protection and legislatively against that policy.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I desire to address the Senate briefly before a vote is taken. I understand that the cloakrooms of the Senate are well filled, and I suppose Senators in the cloakrooms are technically within the Senate Chamber, although at this moment there are very few Senators actually present within the Chamber. The brief observations I have to make will therefore be addressed more to the RECORD than to Senators, although I shall be pleased to speak to those who honor me with their presence. All I wish to do is to state my view of the Democratic position on the matter now before the Senate. I suppose Democratic Senators, generally, will be content to express their views by their votes.

Mr. President, I have only two thoughts to present at this time to the Senate. One concerns the statement made by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] that the provisions of the bill covered by the title now under consideration are not Democratic. That is a challenge to Democrats as to the democracy of the bill. Then, secondly, there is another question which relates to the actual merits of this title or these provisions of the bill.

No one in the Senate has greater personal regard for the ability and well-deserved reputation of the Senator from Alabama than I; but I deny his right, as I would deny the right of any other Senator, to speak ex cathedra respecting Democratic doctrine.

I shall not have any discussion with the Senator from Alabama or any other Senator on such a subject. I leave my position with the statement I have made—that no Senator has the right authoritatively to tell the Senate what the true party doctrine is on any subject. The Senator from Alabama has said that this provision of the bill we are considering is antagonistic to everything fundamentally Democratic. I am not attempting to quote his exact verbiage, but I am attempting in a few words to give expression to his opinion as he stated it for our guidance.

Mr. President, I have been a member of the Democratic Party fully as long as—indeed, for some years longer than—my friend from Alabama. That is because I am older than he. I have as good a right to express an opinion about what is true Democracy as the Senator from Alabama. I go further than that. Any Senator on this side has a right to say what he thinks about whether this measure we are considering is Democratic or un-Democratic—as good a right as the Senator from Alabama. The Senator from Alabama has by his service made a record as one of the great Democrats of this Nation, and therefore I say he has absolute leave, here or anywhere, to say what he thinks about any measure before the Senate from the standpoint of Democracy or party policy; but he would say, I am sure, that I have an equal right to express my views upon any such subjects.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, will the Senator from Missouri permit an interruption?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. VARDAMAN in the chair). Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. STONE. I do.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will state to the Senator from Missouri that while I do not recall my exact language, I will not controvert in any way his statement, which was that I stated that this particular paragraph of the bill under consideration was not in accord with the principles of Democracy. That is only an expression of opinion. I concede to every other Senator his right to an opinion on the same subject. The only question involved is this: I expressed my reasons and the facts on which I based my reasons in making my statement. If those facts are true and my reasoning was correct, then I was sound in my statement. It is not a question of my criticizing any of my brother Senators on this side. I merely announced a conclusion and gave the facts on which I based the statement. My reasoning is based on those facts, and it is a question for the Senate and for the country to determine whether the reasoning from those facts is sound or otherwise.

Mr. STONE. The Senator from Alabama did just what he says, and I will have no semblance of quarrel with him about that. As to whether this provision of the bill is Democratic or not, I have only this to say:

This measure has, first, the approval of the Democratic House of Representatives. I do not mean that the House has yet approved of the entire verbiage of the bill as now before us, with the Senate amendments, but I do say that the House has approved of all the essential features of the bill as now before us. Substantially the bill, in this particular—that is as to the provision under consideration—remains almost identically as the House passed it.

This provision therefore expresses the judgment of the Democratic House of Representatives. That is something to begin with when we come to inquire about Democratic doctrine.

Then the Finance Committee of the Senate indorsed the action of the House, with some amendments as to details, which are submitted to the Senate. The action of the Democratic Finance Committee, before being submitted to the Senate, was submitted to the Democratic conference, and that body, representing the entire Democratic representation on this floor, approved the action of the committee and authorized the committee to present the bill in its present form to the Senate.

The President of the United States and, I will undertake to say, the Vice President of the United States approve this legislation, and the President and the Vice President are our candidates for reelection.

So, then, what have we here? We have the judgment of the Democratic President and Vice President; we have the judgment of the Democratic House of Representatives; we have the judgment of the Democratic Finance Committee of the Senate; and we have the judgment of the Democratic conference of the Senate.

Against this, all of this, one or two, possibly more, Senators on this side project their individual opinions and undertake to say that they know better than all the balance of us what is real Democracy and what is the wisest policy for the party to pursue in the party interest or in the public interest.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. STONE. With pleasure.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Unquestionably the Senator is correct about the House of Representatives, both on the Democratic side and on the Republican side, having approved this schedule. He is correct about the Finance Committee, as I understand, both on the Republican side and the Democratic side, having approved it. I do not know whether the President has taken an affirmative position in reference to the items and the duties levied in this bill or not. My contention is, however—and I think it is admitted by practically everybody I have talked to—that this tax is levied for the sake of protection, not for the sake of revenue. In that case, it is contrary to the doctrine of the party declared in its platform; and unquestionably a position of that kind has not the approval of the Democratic masses of the American people, as evidenced in the recent elections that have taken place in the United States.

Mr. STONE. I do not know what the Senator means by "the recent elections."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I mean the election of 1910, when they returned a Democratic House of Representatives in protest against the passage of the high-tariff duties in the Aldrich-Payne bill; the election of 1912, when they clearly elected Mr. Wilson President of the United States on a platform declaring for the Democratic principle of a tariff for revenue, when it was one of the great issues of the campaign, when it was the main issue, and he was returned on that issue. Now we admittedly reverse the engine and write a protective schedule into this bill.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I do not care to go into all that; it would only be confusing. I will go on from the point I had reached when I was interrupted by the Senator from Alabama. As to whether this provision in this bill is sound Democracy—I wish to put the words "sound Democracy" as broadly as possible—whether this is sound Democracy, to say nothing of the academic question as to whether it is sound economic policy, I prefer, for myself, to stand by the judgment of a Democratic House of Representatives, of a Democratic Senate committee, of a Democratic Senate conference—all backed, as I say it is, by a Democratic President—than to take even the judgment of so distinguished a gentleman as the Senator from Alabama. So much I have to say, and no more, in defense of the position that this provision of the bill is sound from a Democratic standpoint; so much in reply to the animadversions of the Senator from Alabama.

Is this really Democratic? I say it is; and in a few words, condensing my argument, I mean to show that it is both a wise economic measure and literally a Democratic measure.

It is true, as the Senator from Alabama says, that the Democratic Party does not as a matter of national policy approve the idea of levying customs duties purely for protective purposes. Of course, I agree to that. The Democratic tariff policy, generally speaking, is one lying upon the basic idea of raising revenue for the support of the Government, and not primarily and purely for what we call protection. The bill known as the "Underwood bill"—in the preparation of which the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] had as much to do as any of his colleagues of the House Ways and Means Committee, possibly more—I indorse. Moreover, as chairman of the platform committee at the St. Louis convention held two and a half months ago, I cordially agreed to write into the national platform a declaration of unqualified indorsement of the general principles of the Underwood bill.

But there is another thing we have written into our platform. Let us not chain our thought to one proposition alone. We have declared for more than one thing, but for numerous things of equal importance. We have more than once, in fact, many times, written into our platforms that the Democratic Party is stubbornly opposed to any form of commercial or industrial monopoly. That is an old policy of the Democratic Party; that is the accepted doctrine of the party; and, I am happy to believe, is the generally accepted doctrine of the American people.

What are we here called on to do? What do we confront? Mr. President, there is no dye industry in the United States. There is no dye industry in Great Britain, or France, or Italy, or in any other European country of any moment, except Germany. Are you listening to what I am saying? I want those of you who are here to listen to this. My friend from Alabama is doing me the honor of giving me his attention, and I am glad of that. I repeat the statement that there is no essential, permanent dye manufacturing industry in the United States, or, for that matter, in any nation of the world, outside of Germany. That is a great tribute to Germany, but it is hard on the United States.

Mr. UNDERWOOD rose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I did not intend to interrupt the Senator, but he has called attention to my presence and he has made a statement as though desiring to have me accept it.

Mr. STONE. The Senator was listening to me, and I complimented myself by saying he was present and honoring me with his attention.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I thank the Senator, but I do not wish to be put in the attitude of accepting as my conclusion the statement of the Senator. I desire to call his attention to the fact that from fifty to sixty million pounds of these dyestuffs cover the consumption of the American market, and Mr. Schoellkopf testified that he was making at the time he testified in January at his plant 14,000,000 pounds. There was a time when the Schoellkopf plant bought their intermediates and made only the finished product. Then the Senator might have said as far as that plant was concerned it was not a real dye industry, but to-day they are manufacturing the product from the raw material, and one man alone in the United States, according to that testimony last January, was making one-fourth of the product that is consumed by the American people. There were other plants in the country when one was making one-fourth of the entire consumption. I do not think the statement of the Senator in saying that there is no dye industry is justified by the facts.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, it may be that I should have modified what I said to this extent, that whatever dyestuff industry of real moment we have in the United States now is due not to prohibitory tariffs but to the prohibitory effects of the European war. Germany, the practically sole manufacturer of dyestuffs, can not bring them to us. War conditions, not tariff rates, make imports impossible. Accordingly a mushroom industry has sprung up. The Senator's statement confirms the thought I had in mind and was trying to express, that we have no permanent, dependable dyestuff industry in the United States, and have not had for years, nor has any other country in the world outside of Germany. That is positively true. And I may add that this is greatly to the credit of Germany, but not to the honor or industrial advantage of the United States.

Mr. President, in this connection I may say that Japan is waking up. I wish to read from a Tokio dispatch appearing in this morning's Washington Post, showing what Japan is doing. The dispatch speaks of various new industries upon which Japan is entering, due in large measure to the stress of the European war, and as a result of the lessons of the war.

With respect to dyestuffs and chemicals, the dispatch says:

> Dyestuffs (aniline salts and black dyes), chemicals (subnitrate of bismuth, salicylic acid, antipyrin, acetate of calcium, and formalin), glasswares, celluloid, paper, pulp, phosphorus, potassium chloride, and soda.

That is, Japan is for the first time entering into these industries. The dyestuffs mentioned would furnish only a limited supply, but it is a start on a most important line. Japan is starting in to furnish her textile industries with what is essential to their life.

Mr. PENROSE. Will the Senator permit an inquiry?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. STONE. Whenever the Senator from Pennsylvania gets up I can not but feel that he is trying to stir up something.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator yield?

Mr. STONE. I do not want to get into any controversy with the Senator from Pennsylvania.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri refuses to yield.

Mr. STONE. If the Senator merely wishes to ask me a civil question, I yield.

Mr. PENROSE. That is the only kind I ever ask. I wished to ask the Senator whether he announced his position as believing in a protective duty to found an infant industry in the United States in the shape of the dyestuff industry—whether that is the novel doctrine advanced by the Democratic leader in Congress?

Mr. STONE. I am going in a few words to state my position.

Mr. PENROSE. All right. I will wait with interest. The Senator is making a wonderfully interesting tariff speech.

Mr. STONE. I am not making a tariff speech. I am not thinking of the tariff. This is not a question of establishing a protective duty to foster an infant industry along the line of the Senator's school of politics, but along a wholly different line of thought. I have not in mind the Senator's thought of merely protecting an industry against fair competition by a prohibitive duty, but I have in mind the distinction of a great, dominating monopoly, flourishing at the expense of American industry. Our American people are opposed to any sort of grasping, throttling monopoly, domestic or foreign. I know that is the position of the Democratic Party; and I believe it to be the position of the American people.

Now, Mr. President, the dyestuff industry of the world has been for years controlled by Germany. With respect to this vital industry the world has been subject to Germany. No other nation in the world manufactures enough dyestuffs for its own use in normal times. Undoubtedly Germany has a world monopoly on dyestuffs. If such a monopoly as that we know to exist in that foreign country should be attempted in the United States the courts of the United States, under our anti-trust laws, would take it in hand, as they have taken other monopolies in hand, and dissipate it.

But this monopoly is not subject to the authority of the United States. The United States has no control over it. It is controlled by combinations in a foreign country, which combinations are backed, supported, and controlled by the Government of that foreign country. How shall we deal with that? Great Britain, France, Italy—no European power has been able to contend against this monopoly in the past, although these are great manufacturing nations. They have been subject to the same monopolistic exactions to which the United States has been subjected. It has been stated to us in the committee that where efforts have been made by men in this country to start dye industries, confined to the manufacture of only a few dyes—perhaps half a dozen out of hundreds—the agents of German concerns have gone to them—that is what they have said—and told them that if they would not enlarge the scope of their manufacture, but keep within present limits, there would be no fight against them. Moreover, these foreign commercial dictators told these American manufacturers that if they would agree to their terms they would make them their agents for the distribution of German-manufactured dyes in the United States, and that if that proposition was not accepted they would flood the market to which the American manufacturer had access with competing goods that did not take into account the question of profit or loss.

Mr. President, here is a giant monopoly—confessed monopoly—in a foreign country dominating, defiant, and in absolute control of a great industry essential in its effects to many important industries of our country. What shall we do about that? Every nation on earth has yielded and fallen before it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. STONE. I do.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I desire to ask the Senator if he expects by excluding German dyes from this country to destroy a monopoly in Germany, and what effect that would have upon the American people. At the time the so-called German monopoly was selling goods in this country we were getting dyes at 4 and 5 cents a pound, which when excluded by war conditions go to 70 and 80 cents a pound. It is beneficial to our people even though it is a monopoly. When it was coming into the market we got the dyes for 4 or 5 cents a pound, and when it is kept out of the market we are paying 60 and 70 and 80 cents a pound for the same dyes.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I answer with perfect frankness in this way: I do not believe that where a monopoly exists anywhere in the world—government sustained, as this is, or otherwise, whatever the force behind it, a monopoly that controls the world's markets and subjects American industries to its edicts—the United States ought to submit to that situation.

Mr. President, there is no need for me to speak about the importance of dyestuffs to our industries; and I mean industries of inestimable and necessary value to our people, industries where millions of people are employed and where millions of capital are invested—all dependent for life upon a single monopoly, and that a foreign monopoly. What think you of that? The thing to my mind is intolerable.

Suppose it were not dyestuffs, but coal——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Or sugar.

Mr. STONE. Yes; or sugar or anything that supplies a family necessity; think of a monopoly that would shut such necessities out. How long would we stand for that, even if it were a domestic monopoly? And how long would we suffer from such ills if inflicted by a foreign monopoly? That is the exact principle involved in this legislation now proposed.

Mr. President, I am for this bill on Democratic antimonopoly grounds; not on the grounds of a protective tariff. I am for this clause of the bill as written because I am opposed to any great monopoly, even in this country—much less in any foreign country—controlling the supplies of any great commodity necessary to the industries of this country.

How shall we meet an evil of this kind? That is the question. I do not know how we can reach an evil of this kind, except through the customhouses.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. STONE. Certainly.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The Senator says that we must pass this bill, because it will keep out of this country a German monopoly, and yet we pass it in face of the fact that two industrial plants alone say that they will supply the entire market if this bill passes. We drive out the so-called German monopoly that has served us at low prices, and create an American monopoly at high prices.

Mr. STONE. My friend from Alabama is too good a logician to believe that what he states is a sound argument. His statement has the appearance of a mere evasion. We have, so the Senator says, two concerns in the United States producing dyestuffs sufficient to meet substantially the needs af the American textile industries at this time. I do not know about that, but I doubt it. They may be able to do so in a small way as to certain limited number of dyes, but not in the larger way.

Mr. President, the Senator asks, Are we going to drive out the foreign monopoly and open the door to a domestic monopoly? No; I do not intend to do that; but if I should be compelled to choose between a foreign monopoly and a domestic monopoly, I would take the one at home, for this reason if no other, that whenever it should be established that there was a monopoly existing in contravention of the laws of the United States, the Department of Justice could proceed to suppress it.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. STONE. I do.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, I do not know that I have followed the argument of the Senator from Missouri exactly, but I should like to ask him if he contends that this tax is not levied as a protective measure, but solely as a means of overcoming the monopoly in this industry now enjoyed by the Germans under the protection of their Government? I understand that that is his line of argument.

Mr. STONE. I speak for myself, and am simply stating my own attitude. I have supported, and now support, this provision of the bill upon the ground that I believe it is the only means at the command of the Government of the United States by which it can destroy a foreign monopoly preying upon our country.

Mr. OLIVER. Then, Mr. President, I will ask the Senator how he reconciles that statement with this declaration of the Democratic Party, which I shall read:

> We declare it to be a fundamental principle of the Democratic Party that the Federal Government, under the Constitution, has no right or power to impose or collect tariff duties except for the purpose of revenue.

Now, confessedly, this is not for the purpose of revenue——

Mr. STONE. Oh, Mr. President——

Mr. OLIVER. And still the Senator contends it is in full accord with Democratic doctrines.

Mr. STONE. Oh, well——

Mr. OLIVER. Now, if the Senator will allow me to finish, I desire to say that I am heartily in accord with the conclusion of the Senator in support of this provision.

Mr. STONE. But for a wholly different reason.

Mr. OLIVER. But I can not understand how his reason is in accord with the printed declaration of the Democratic Party, though still he contends that it is.

Mr. STONE. The Senator is in accord with me, so he says, but he admits for a wholly different reason. He would put prohibitory tariff duties upon practically everything to establish universal monopoly in the United States.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, the Senator has no right to say what I would do under any circumstances.

Mr. STONE. I say that is what the Republican Party stands for as a general proposition.

Mr. OLIVER. Let the Senator stigmatize the Republican Party, if he will, but he has no right to say what I personally or individually would do under any other circumstances than those which exist to-day.

Mr. STONE. That is true, and if I have offended I apologize. I merely said what the Senator would do, because he is such a fine representative of his political party.

Mr. OLIVER. The Senator compliments me beyond my deserts.

Mr. STONE. Now, Mr. President, I am through. I wish only to remark that I stand for this bill, because I know of no other way to break down and free our industries from the domination of a great foreign monopoly that preys upon them. The old political feature of a tariff, the question of protection or free trade, is not involved. The question is, Shall we use the only power this Government has at its command, the taxing power, to destroy or to control a monopoly of the kind I have indicated?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the Committee on Finance.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I ask for the yeas and nays on that question.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. STONE. I understand the motion—I have been asked concerning it by a number of Senators—is to strike out a portion of the House text. Am I correct?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the Senate committee amendment, on page 128, striking out the House text beginning in line 15 of that page and extending to line 12, on page 129, and inserting new matter from that point down to line 19, on page 138; and also the Senate committee amendment in Group III, on page 130, down to the end of line 3, on page 131.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I asked that the Senate committee amendments to Group II and to Group III be considered together. I understand we are voting on the question of the adoption of the Senate committee amendments to both Group II and Group III at one time?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is what the Chair has stated.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. HUGHES. The vote comes now upon the committee amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The vote comes upon the committee amendment.

Mr. HUGHES. A vote "yea" sustains the committee and a vote "nay" opposes the committee amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is true. The Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, so that there may be no mistake about it, I will state that we are not voting now on section 84. The amendment that we are voting on concludes with line 3, on page 131.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is what the Chair has stated.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. As I understand, we are voting on the adoption of the Senate committee amendments, both to group II and group III.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is what the Chair has stated. The Secretary will call the roll.

The SECRETARY proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BRYAN (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND], which I transfer to the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD] and vote "nay."

Mr. COLT (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY]. In view of his absence, I withhold my vote.

Mr. GALLINGER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE] and vote "yea."

Mr. GRONNA (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Maine [Mr. JOHNSON]. In his absence, I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. SHAFROTH (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA] and vote "yea."

Mr. SIMMONS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP], but, by virtue of an understanding with him, I am permitted to vote, and I vote "yea."

Mr. SMITH of Georgia (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] to the senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK]. I will let that transfer remain for the balance of the day and vote "yea" on this question.

Mr. STONE (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK] to the senior Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN] and vote "yea."

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER]. In his absence I withhold my vote. I desire, however, to be counted present for the purpose of making a quorum.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan (when Mr. TOWNSEND'S name was called). I desire the RECORD to show that my colleague [Mr. TOWNSEND] is detained from the Senate because of illness in his family. He is paired, however, with the Senator from Florida [Mr. BRYAN]. If my colleague were present and at liberty to vote, he would vote "yea."

Mr. UNDERWOOD (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING]. In his absence I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK], and I wish to announce that the junior Senator from Georgia asked me to state that if he were present he would vote against the committee amendment. I vote "nay."

The PRESIDING OFFICER (when Mr. VARDAMAN'S name was called). The present occupant of the chair has a pair with the junior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY]. In the absence of a transfer the Chair withholds his vote. If permitted to vote, he would vote "nay."

Mr. WEEKS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES], which I transfer to the senior Senator from California [Mr. WORKS] and vote "yea."

I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. LODGE] is unavoidably absent. He has a general pair with the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH].

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. BECKHAM. I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT] to the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] and vote "yea."

Mr. WARREN. My colleague [Mr. CLARK of Wyoming] is unavoidably absent. He is paired with the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE]. If present, my colleague would vote "yea."

Mr. DILLINGHAM (after having voted in the affirmative). May I inquire if the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH] has voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He has not.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Then I am obliged to withdraw my vote, having a pair with that Senator.

Mr. PENROSE (after having voted in the affirmative). I observe that the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] has not voted. I am paired with that Senator, but I transfer the pair to the senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] and will let my vote stand

Mr. COLT. I transfer my pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] to the senior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] and vote "yea."

Mr. MYERS. I inquire if the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN] has voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He has not.

Mr. MYERS. I have a pair with the Senator from Connecticut, which I transfer to the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON] and vote "yea."

At this time I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. WALSH] is necessarily absent. He is paired with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. LIPPITT].

The PRESIDING OFFICER [Mr. VARDAMAN]. The present occupant of the chair announces a transfer of his pair to the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] and votes "nay."

Mr. HUGHES. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES]. He is paired with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS]. If present, the Senator from Kentucky would vote "yea."

Mr. OWEN. I inquire if the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CATRON] has voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He has not.

Mr. OWEN. I am paired with that Senator, and therefore withhold my vote. If I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. CURTIS. I am requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN];

The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. LIPPITT] with the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH];

The Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE];

The Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS]; and

So the amendment of the committee was agreed to.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I should like to inquire whether there is any possibility of reaching an agreement to fix a time to vote upon this bill?

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I feel constrained to say to the Senator that there is no possibility of fixing a time at this hour; but I want to assure the Senator that the Senators on this side of the Chamber are quite as anxious as any Senator on the other side can be to facilitate the passage of this bill. I have made inquiry and am fully satisfied that the bill will be passed to-morrow, without any doubt. That is my conviction.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator thinks we could not have an agreement this afternoon. Does the Senator think we could have an agreement to-morrow?

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator could, so far as I am individually concerned, but the inquiries that I have made develop the fact that there will be objection to fixing a time.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator feels confident, however, that we can agree upon a time to-morrow, and that a vote can be had during the next calendar day?

Mr. GALLINGER. During the next calendar day.

Mr. SIMMONS. Before adjournment to-morrow?

Mr. GALLINGER. I have no doubt at all about it; not the least in the world. Of course, all human calculations at times are disappointed, but I assure the Senator that that is my full belief.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. SIMMONS. I do.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I desire to ask the Senator from North Carolina, in charge of the bill, whether it is his intention to have a night session to-night or to adjourn at the usual hour?

Mr. SIMMONS. I desire to say, in reply to the Senator from Alabama, that it is the wish of Senators on the committee, and others with whom I have conferred, that we go on until about 8 o'clock.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I will venture to make the observation, for what it is worth, that no substantial progress will be made by holding the Senate in session longer than the usual hour to-night. There are Senators on this side—I am speaking with entire frankness—who, if we are to have unusual hours, will make speeches. If we do not have unusual hours, those speeches will not be made.

Mr. SIMMONS. I hope the Senator will not make any objection to our going on a little later than usual this afternoon.

Mr. GALLINGER. I want to repeat what I said the other afternoon—that in my judgment we do not make any substantial progress by holding night sessions. If we could lock the galleries I think we might, but as long as the galleries are open—I have watched that for a great many years—we do mighty little legislating. Of course, the matter is in the hands of the Senate.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think we can make a little headway. If it turns out that we are not making headway we can adjourn.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. SIMMONS. I do.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The suggestion of the Senator from North Carolina is that we go on until about the time that the galleries fill, and then stop.

Mr. SMOOT. Would it not be very much better to take a recess at 6.30 to-night until 10 o'clock to-morrow morning? There is not any question in my mind but that we can get through with the bill to-morrow.

Mr. GALLINGER. Not the least.

Mr. SIMMONS. If I felt assured of that I would not insist, but I feel that it is so important that we should finish up this matter to-morrow that if we can make a little further headway this afternoon we ought to do it. I will let it drift on until half past 6, however, and then we will see.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Mr. OWEN. I wish to inquire whether there are any Senators who desire to be heard on the revenue bill now?

Mr. SIMMONS. We will take up the amendments. I hope we may not have much discussion upon the next amendment.

Mr. OWEN. If there is no discussion desired to-night on the revenue bill, I ask that the remainder of the day be devoted to the corrupt-practices act.

Mr. SIMMONS. I can not consent to that, Mr. President. The revenue bill is before the Senate, and I have stated that we did not wish to and would not, unless the Senate directed that it be done, lay it aside to take up anything until we have finished it.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, the time is growing very short——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Mr. OWEN. I will wait until the Senator has concluded.

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield to the Senator. I have not declined to yield to him.

Mr. OWEN. I know, but I do not wish to take up the Senator's time. I desire to make a statement in my own time.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Mr. OLIVER. I desire to call the attention of the Senator from North Carolina to the fact that we have not yet finished the reading of the bill. I suggest that we go right along.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is what I desire to do.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will continue the reading of the bill. That is the question before the Senate.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. OWEN. What I want to call attention to is that if Senators do not want to use the remaining part of the day, since it is the desire of so many——

Mr. SIMMONS. Why, Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. OWEN. I yield for a question; yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator must not have been in here when I stated that I hoped we might continue the consideration of the bill until 8 o'clock in order that we might make further progress with it.

Mr. OWEN. I understand that perfectly, but the Senator is permitting the program to be determined by the minority, and that is what I object to.

Mr. SIMMONS. No; I am not. I have not yielded anything to the minority. I have not changed my purpose.

Mr. OWEN. It is perfectly easy for the minority to use the revenue bill as a buffer with which to use up the time and in that way preclude any reasonable time for the consideration of the corrupt-practices act. It is just as good a way to filibuster against the corrupt-practices act as to do it openly, and I prefer to have it done openly if that is the desire of the minority. I do not want to have the time which is available not utilized when I regard the corrupt-practices act as vital to the welfare of this Nation, and I hope the Senator from North Carolina will go on with the revenue bill until at least 11 o'clock to-night.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. OWEN. I yield the floor.

Mr. SMOOT. I thought the Senator had concluded.

Mr. OWEN. I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I think it is unfair for the Senator from Oklahoma to refer to a "filibuster" on this side of the Chamber. Does the Senator know that most of the day has been occupied by Senators on the other side of the Chamber? Does he know that the discussion was started by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS]? Does he know that the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] and the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES] occupied a great deal of time to-day? Does he know that upon this side of the Chamber the only time that has been occupied was consumed by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], who spoke for about one hour and two minutes, I think, and the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], who occupied about 25 minutes? Then, too, the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] has been speaking.

I do not think it is just or right that the Senator should try to make it appear that there is any filibuster on this side of the Chamber.

Mr. LEWIS rose.

Mr. OLIVER. I call for the regular order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois rose to address the Chair.

Mr. LEWIS. I desire to inform the Senators that there is an item now upon the table that might give opportunity, if not necessity, for debate. I tendered this morning what is called the Webb bill, embodying the export-trade feature, as an amendment to the present measure. It being on the table, I wanted to invite attention to it.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. LEWIS. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. We are not yet through with the committee amendments. As soon as we are through with the committee amendments, the amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois will be in order.

Mr. LEWIS. I thank the Senator, but I was not rising to that point. It was to inform a couple of Senators who wanted to know if that amendment had been introduced. They were of the impression that when it was reached it would entail some debate, and the Senator from Oklahoma desired to regulate his future course in accordance with that matter. I am merely informing those interested that I have tendered the amendment, and it lies on the table, to be called up at the appropriate time. Whether it shall awaken debate or not, I do not know.

PAY OF EMPLOYEES.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, the Senator from North Carolina has kindly agreed to yield to me temporarily to enable me to introduce a joint resolution, which will not take three minutes to consider, I am sure, and which will appeal to every Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there is no objection, the Secretary will read the joint resolution.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 173) authorizing the payment of September salaries to officers and employees of the Senate and House of Representatives on the day of adjournment of the present session, was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Representatives are authorized and instructed to pay the officers and employees of the Senate and House, including the Capitol police and including the pages who shall be continued upon the rolls of September, their respective salaries or per diem for the month of September, 1916, on the day of adjournment of the present session; and the Clerk of the House is authorized to pay on the same day to Members, Delegates, and Resident Commissioners their allowance for clerk hire for the said month of September; and so much money as may be necessary to pay the pages of the Senate and the House of Representatives until the end of September is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. This is an exact copy of the joint resolution adopted in 1914. It is simply to advance their pay to these clerks who have to start home. I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objetion, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THE REVENUE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 16763) to increase the revenue, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the next section of the bill.

The reading of the bill was resumed, beginning with section 84, on page 131.

The next amendment was, on page 131, line 4, after the word "That," to strike out "on and after the day following the passage of this act"; in line 5, after the word "section," to strike out "400" and insert "83"; and in line 9, after the words "Group III" to strike out "except natural and synthetic alizarin, and dyes obtained from alizarin, anthracene, and carbazol; and natural and synthetic indigo and all indigoids, whether or not obtained from indigo," so as to make the clause read:

SEC. 84. That in addition to the duties provided in section 83, there shall be levied, collected, and paid upon all articles contained in Group II a special duty of 2½ cents per pound, and upon all articles contained in Group III a special duty of 5 cents per pound.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, at this time I simply desire to give notice that I shall move to strike out "two and a half" and insert "three and three-quarters," and to strike out "five" and insert "seven and a half"; but I shall not do that until the committee amendments are disposed of.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 131, line 15, after the word "after," to strike out "the passage of"; and in the same line, after the word "this," to strike out "act" and insert "title shall go into effect," so as to make the clause read:

During the period of five years beginning five years after this title shall go into effect, such special duties shall be annually reduced by 20 per cent of the rate imposed by this section, so that at the end of such period such special duties shall no longer be assessed, levied, or collected; but if, at the expiration of five years from the date of the passage of this act, the President finds that there is not being manufactured or produced within the United States as much as 60 per cent in value of the domestic consumption of the articles mentioned in Groups II and III of section 400, he shall by proclamation so declare, whereupon the special duties imposed by this section on such articles shall no longer be assessed, levied, or collected.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. OLIVER. I suggest that in line 24, page 131, "section 400" should be changed to "section 83."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 24, page 131, strike out "400" and insert "83" after the word "section."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 132, line 4, after the words "twenty-three," to insert "and the words 'salicylic acid' in paragraph 1," so as to make the clause read:

SEC. 85. That paragraphs 20, 21, 22, and 23 and the words "salicylic acid" in paragraph 1 of Schedule A of section 1 of an act entitled "An act to reduce tariff duties and to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes," approved October 3, 1913, and paragraphs 394, 452, and 514, and the words "carbolic" and "phthalic," in paragraph 387 of the "free list" of section 1 of said act, and so much of said act or any existing law or parts of law as may be inconsistent with this title are hereby repealed.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 132, after line 15, to insert:

SEC. 86. That until the termination of the present European war, or until the conditions of importations of the articles therein specified shall have been substantially restored, which shall be evidenced by the proclamation of the President of the United States to that effect, the provisions of Title V of this act shall not take effect or become operative.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Secretary proceeded to read the amendment, "Title VI, printing paper," beginning on page 132, line 22.

Mr. HUGHES. In order to clarify the title we have just finished, I should like to return to page 130, line 12, and propose an amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there is no objection, the vote by which the amendment of the committee, on page 130, was agreed to will be reconsidered.

Mr. HUGHES. In line 12, after the word "acids," I move to insert "equal to or more than," so as to read:

A quantity of tar acids equal to or more than 5 per cent.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HUGHES. In lines 12 and 13, I move to strike out the words "or more," so as to read: "5 per cent of the original distillate."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. HUGHES. In the next paragraph, on page 130, line 23, "phenalic" should read "phenolic."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That amendment will be agreed to without objection.

Mr. HUGHES. On page 131, line 1, I move to strike out the word "including."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment will be agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. Just a moment. Is the Senator from New Jersey quite sure that the word "including" should be stricken out?

Mr. HUGHES. I feel certain that it should be stricken out. I will say to the Senator. It was suggested to me by the Treasury Department, and the reason seemed to me to be sound. If there is any question about it I will be glad to talk to the Senator about it. The matter can be reached later in the consideration of the bill or in conference.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator I think the word "including" is necessary. It reads "including natural alizarin and indigo and color dyes, or color lakes obtained, derived, or manufactured therefrom."

Mr. HUGHES. I will ask the Senator to let the amendment be adopted. I shall be perfectly willing to revert to it later.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. HUGHES. I do.

Mr. WEEKS. I should like to have the Senator explain briefly what this will do. There were no hearings, no evidence, no explanation of any kind. I do not understand it myself, and I should like to have some explanation of it.

Mr. HUGHES. All right. I shall be delighted to explain it to the Senator privately as well as publicly.

Mr. WEEKS. I am looking for information.

Mr. HUGHES. I will be glad to give the Senator all the information I have. That will not take me long.

Mr. WEEKS. I think as long as the information will not take very long, it had better be made public.

Mr. HUGHES. What is the Senator referring to?

Mr. WEEKS. I am referring to the paragraph relating to paper that we have under consideration.

Mr. HUGHES. I was not directing myself to that paragraph, because——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That paragraph is not before the Senate now.

Mr. WEEKS. Is not the paragraph beginning on page 132, line 22, before the Senate now?

Mr. HUGHES. No; it is not. I will say to the Senator I am dealing with the title of dyestuffs. I have not attempted to make any change in the paper title, and I do not purpose to make any as far as I am concerned; I am going to leave that to some one else. I have trouble enough of my own. I ask unanimous consent to recur to page 99 and to offer the following amendment——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair suggests to the Senator that the amendment just offered be disposed of before taking up another amendment.

Mr. HUGHES. I understood that it was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection, and it will be considered as agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. Is that the print-paper title?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No; that is not before the Senate; it is in the dyestuff title. The Senator from New Jersey asks unanimous consent to return to page 99 and to add a new section, which will be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert as section 56, after line 15, on page 99, the following:

SEC. 56. That section 3255 of the Revised Statutes as amended by act of June 3, 1896, and as further amended by act of March 2, 1911, be further amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 3255. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may exempt distillers of brandy made exclusively from apples, peaches, grapes, pears, pineapples, oranges, apricots, berries, plums, pawpaws, persimmons, prunes, figs, or cherries from any provision of this title relating to the manufacture of spirits, except as to the tax thereon, when in his judgment it may seem expedient to do so: Provided, That where, in manufacture of wine, artificial sweetening has been used the wine or the fruit pomace residuum may be used in the distillation of brandy, as such use shall not prevent the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, from exempting such distiller from any provision of this title relating to the manufacture of spirits, except as to the tax thereon, when in his judgment it may seem expedient to do so: And provided further, That the distillers mentioned in this section may add to not less than 500 gallons (or 10 barrels) of grape cheese not more than 500 gallons of a sugar solution made from cane, beet, starch, or corn sugar, such solution to have a saccharine strength of not to exceed 10 per cent, and may ferment the resultant mixture on a winery or distillery premises, and such fermented product shall be regarded as distilling material."

Mr. GALLINGER. This seems to be a pretty important amendment. I should like the Senator from New Jersey to give some explanation of it.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator will pardon me, that is not a committee amendment, and I hope the Senator from New Jersey will let us finish the committee amendments.

Mr. HUGHES. Of course, if the Senator insists upon proceeding in order——

Mr. SIMMONS. I have insisted in the case of the Senator from Illinois, and I think I ought to apply the same rule to the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. HUGHES. It makes no difference to me whether the amendment is passed or not. I should like to get what I am charged with doing off my mind as soon as possible. There was no opposition to this amendment on the part of anyone, as far as I know.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Jersey asks unanimous consent——

Mr. SIMMONS. If there is no objection, I will not object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is going to find out whether there is objection. Is there objection?

Mr. GALLINGER. Unless the amendment is explained, I shall object.

Mr. HUGHES. I will be glad to explain it.

Mr. GALLINGER. It seems to be an applejack amendment, and I should like to know something about it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the consideration of the amendment now?

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, I really think we ought to complete the reading of the bill and let the amendment come in afterwards.

Mr. HUGHES. I ask that the amendment may lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will lie on the table, and the Secretary will state the next amendment.

The next amendment was, on page 132, after line 21, to insert:

TITLE VI. PRINTING PAPER.

SEC. 87. That section 322, Schedule M, and section 567 of the free list of the tariff act of October 3, 1913, be amended so that the same shall read as follows:

"SEC. 322. Printing paper (other than paper commercially known as handmade or machine handmade paper, japan paper, and imitation japan paper by whatever name known), unsized, sized, or glued, suitable for the printing of books and newspapers, but not for covers or bindings, not specially provided for in this section, valued above 5 cents per pound, 12 per cent ad valorem: Provided, however, That if any country, dependency, province, or other subdivision of government shall impose any export duty, export license fee, or other charge of any kind whatsoever (whether in the form of additional charge or license fee or otherwise) upon printing paper, wood pulp, or wood for use in the manufacture of wood pulp, there shall be imposed upon printing paper, valued above 5 cents per pound, when imported either directly or indirectly from such country, dependency, province, or other subdivision of government, an additional duty equal to the amount of the highest export duty or other export charge imposed by such country, dependency, province, or other subdivision of government, upon either printing paper or upon an amount of wood pulp, or wood for use in the manufacture of wood pulp necessary to manufacture such printing paper.

"SEC. 567. Printing paper (other than paper commercially known as handmade or machine handmade paper, japan paper, and imitation japan paper by whatever name known), unsized, sized, or glued, suitable for the printing of books and newspapers, but not for covers or bindings, not specially provided for in this section, valued at not above 5 cents per pound, decalcomania paper not printed."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I recall very vividly the controversy that arose not long ago over this matter of print paper, when it was contended that, if we removed the duty and allowed Canada to bring paper into this country on more favorable terms, it would reduce the cost of paper. I am not going to argue this question at all, nor precipitate a tariff discussion, but I want to put in the RECORD precisely what has happened since this class of paper was put on the free list. I will ask the Secretary to read the table I have sent to the desk.

Mr. SIMMONS. Does the Senator desire it read?

Mr. GALLINGER. It is just a few lines, and I should like to have it read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

Imports of news print paper from Canada.

	Tons.
1911	54,485
1912	84,634
1913	218,793
1914	310,401
1915	366,921
January, 1916	35,986
February, 1916	35,838
March, 1916	41,952
April, 1916	38,032
May, 1916	43,845

For five months, January to May, 1916, inclusive, 195,653 tons have been imported. At that rate the importations for 1916 will be 469,560 tons.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I put that table in the RECORD for the purpose of showing that we have transferred this industry to Canada; and I do not know that we are getting paper any cheaper. On the contrary, I understand that the cost of print paper is higher than it was when we transferred the industry from our own country to a foreign country.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, when in the present tariff law provision was made for the free importation of paper not costing more than a certain sum per pound, I think it was done with practically general assent in the Senate.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not mean to say that it was unanimous, but I think there was general assent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me, in my feeble way, occupying considerable time, I entered as earnest a protest against it as I knew how to do.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not recall the attitude of the Senator from New Hampshire exactly, and, of course, I accept his statement as to what his attitude was at the time; but I think that I am safe in saying that the action taken was with the acquiescence of pretty nearly the entire Senate and the entire Congress. It was in response to an almost universal, if not quite universal, demand from the newspapers for cheaper print paper, and was based largely upon educational grounds. Now, the price of print paper has gone far beyond the limit as to value fixed in the tariff law, and the papers are not getting the benefit of the free paper intended by the provision in the present law to be accorded to them; and if they are to have the benefit of the privilege of getting print paper duty free, then it is necessary to raise the limit as to value per pound. That is all there is in this amendment. I myself do not care to discuss it, but I simply wanted to state the reason why the committee put this provision in the bill.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, this amendment is put in, as the Senator from North Carolina states, for the purpose of securing, as far as possible, the favor of the newspapers of the country. I do not say that the Senator from North Carolina stated that, but I say that that is the open and palpable purpose.

Mr. SIMMONS. I hope the Senator will not put words in my mouth which I did not utter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. OLIVER. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. What I said was that the original provision was placed in the tariff law, whether rightfully or wrongfully—I shall make no contention as to that, and I do not intend to enter upon a defense of it now—as a concession to the newspapers; and if they are to get the benefit of that concession we have got to change the limitation. That is all there is to it.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, I will withdraw my statement in the form in which it was then expressed and say that the original act taking the duty off print paper valued at not above 2½ cents a pound was placed in the law as a concession to the newspapers of the country. This amendment is put in as a further concession.

As one of the favored class, Mr. President—because I am a newspaper publisher—I may say that I never asked any such concession, but that I was opposed to it; that I never believed it would enable me in the end to buy paper any cheaper than it could be obtained under a fair and reasonable duty placed upon imports of paper; and I am firmly of the opinion now that the present shortage of paper in this country would be by no means so acute if the duty upon print paper had been allowed to remain at $2 per ton, because the moment that the duty was taken off all development of the paper industry within the borders of the United States ceased as if by magic, and the development in Canada, while it has been great, as shown by the figures submitted by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], has been by no means as great as would have been the development in this country if Congress had trusted to the enterprise and the energy of our own people who would have put up additional units and added to their paper-making capacity as fast as the demands of the newspapers of the country required. So I believe that the present shortage of paper would have been to a certain extent avoided—not altogether, perhaps, because the demand for paper has been phenomenal during the last year, while the supply of some of the materials for making paper, owing to conditions arising out of the war, has been restricted to a certain extent—but if we had continued the duty on paper, I believe that news-print paper to-day would not have been selling above 2½ cents per pound; and if we should place a fair and reasonable duty upon it now and encourage the establishment and the enlargement of the industry within our own borders, I believe that within a short time the problem before the newspapers of the country would be solved.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the agreeing to the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed, and the Secretary read to the end of section 90, on page 136, line 23.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I have concluded, as the result of some arrangements that have been made by which I think the disposition of the bill can be facilitated, not to insist upon a night session. I therefore move that when the Senate takes a recess to-night it be until 10 o'clock to-morrow morning.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Why not move a recess now? It is practically 6.30 o'clock.

Mr. SIMMONS. No; a brief executive session is desired.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from North Carolina.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President——

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President, I move that the Secretary be authorized to change the text of the bill in order to correspond with the new numbering of the paragraphs.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. STERLING. I submit an amendment to the Tariff Commission feature of the bill, and ask to have it printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will lie on the table and be printed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. STONE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

RECESS.

Mr. SIMMONS. I move that the Senate take a recess until to-morrow morning at 10 o'clock.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock and 29 minutes p. m., Monday, September 4, 1916) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Tuesday, September 5, 1916, at 10 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, September 4, 1916.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We bless Thee, our Father in heaven, for this newborn day, token of Thy presence and continued care; for our great and growing Republic, with its vast resources, manifold industries, its educational facilities and scientific achievements, its religious liberty and philanthropic institutions; for the great opportunities it affords for development of all that is best in man.

We pray for an increased patriotic citizenship, which shall solidify our Government into a perfect whole, that we may continue to grow in all that makes a nation great and strong; that peace may be ours, and a place among the nations for increased good in all the world, and everlasting praise shall be Thine, in the name of the Prince of Peace. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday, September 2, 1916, was read and approved.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of Americanism and John Ericsson.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the subject of Americanism and John Ericsson. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. I ask unanimous consent that my colleague [Mr. CHIPERFIELD] be permitted to extend his remarks in the RECORD by inserting a speech in relation to the National Guard which he delivered before the American Society of Military Law at the meeting of the American Bar Association.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] asks unanimous consent that his colleague [Mr. CHIPERFIELD] have permission to extend his remarks by printing in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a speech that he made recently on the subject of the National Guard. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. McARTHUR. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing remarks on the eight-hour law, and also on the question of preparedness.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oregon asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the eight-hour law and on the subject of preparedness.

Mr. ADAMSON. Reserving the right to object, I announced on Saturday, with the concurrence of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], that I would ask for general leave to print on the eight-hour law, and I now make that request.

The SPEAKER. First, is there objection to the latter part of the request of the gentleman from Oregon?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] asks unanimous consent that all gentlemen have permission to print in the RECORD speeches on the subject of the eight-hour law, and so forth. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. For how many days?

Mr. ADAMSON. I do not know that it makes any difference. How many days would suit the gentleman?

Mr. MANN. I am not particular.

Mr. ADAMSON. I will say 10 days, so as to give them plenty of time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent that all Members have leave to print remarks on the subject of the eight-hour law for 10 days. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I take it those speeches will appear in the permanent RECORD as of to-day and not as of last Friday.

Mr. ADAMSON. That is what they ought to do.

The SPEAKER. The speeches printed under this leave to appear in the permanent RECORD as if delivered to-day. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

COMPENSATION FOR INJURED FEDERAL EMPLOYEES—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to present a conference report on the workmen's compensation bill, H. R. 15316.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman presents a conference report to be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. MANN. I think it ought to be disposed of now.

Mr. WEBB. I ask unanimous consent that we may now consider the conference report. It is very brief.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] asks unanimous consent to consider this conference report now, the rule about printing to the contrary notwithstanding. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the conference report, as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT (NO. 1195).

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 15316) to provide compensation for employees of the United States suffering injuries while in the performance of their duties, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

Amendment numbered 1: That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 1, to the amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by said amendment insert the following:

"SEC. 28a. Upon the organization of said commission and notification of the heads of all executive departments that the commission is ready to take up the work devolved upon it by this act, all commissions and independent bureaus, by or in which payments for compensation are now provided, together with the adjustment and settlement of such claims, shall cease and determine, and such executive departments, commissions, and independent bureaus, shall transfer all pending claims to said commission to be administered by it. The said commission may obtain, in all cases, in addition to the reports provided in section 24, such information and such reports from employees of the departments as may be agreed upon by the commission and the heads of the respective departments. All clerks and employees now exclusively engaged in carrying on said work in the various executive departments, commissions, and independent bureaus, shall be transferred to, and become employees of, the commission at their present grades and salaries."

And the House agree to the same.

E. Y. WEBB,
WARREN GARD,
A. J. VOLSTEAD,
Managers on the part of the House.

HOKE SMITH,
CLAUDE A. SWANSON,
W. E. BORAH,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

INDIAN SCHOOLS.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 6748) providing that Indian schools may be maintained without restriction as to annual rate of expenditure per pupil.

The SPEAKER. Is it on the House Calendar?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. On the Union Calendar. It is an emergency matter.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a Senate bill, which the Clerk will report.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That all moneys appropriated or available for Indian school purposes may be expended without restriction as to per capita expenditure for the annual support and education of any one pupil in any Indian school.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 1, line 6, after the word "school" insert: "Provided, That in no event shall the per capita cost at any one school exceed the sum of $200.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. This bill is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I ask unanimous consent to consider it in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to consider it in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. I suppose that amendment means $200 per annum.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Per annum and per capita; yes.

Mr. MANN. Should not the words "per annum" be inserted?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I have no objection to that. It means so much per capita.

Mr. MANN. If you do not put in the words "per annum," it will soon close the school. I move to amend by inserting after "$200" the words "per annum."

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the amendment by inserting after the word "$200" the words "per annum."

Mr. NORTON. Would it not be inferred from the text of the bill that the words "per capita" referred to the length of time, "per annum"—per capita, per annum?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I think the preceding language of the bill possibly would cover the point which the gentleman from Illinois seems to desire. I think both points are covered by that language.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] to the committee amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to a third reading, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. STEPHENS of Texas, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks upon the record of this and the last Congress and the present administration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks on the record of this Congress, the last preceding Congress, and the administration. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

FARM-LOAN ASSOCIATIONS.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have Circular No. 2, of the Treasury Department, relating to how farmers may form national farm-loan associations, printed as a public document, and that 25,000 extra copies be printed beside the usual number.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent to have printed as a House document Circular No. 2, of the Treasury Department, in regard to farm-loan associations. Is there objection?

Mr. FOSTER. Reserving the right to object, I would like to ask if the chairman of the Printing Committee, Mr. BARNHART, has been consulted.

Mr. STEENERSON. I asked the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BARNHART] in regard to it, and he said he wanted me to present it, that he could not get a meeting of the committee. It will cost less than $100.

Mr. MANN. Why does not the commission print it?

Mr. STEENERSON. They have printed it, but we can not get copies.

Mr. COX. Is this Circular No. 62?

Mr. STEENERSON. No; No. 2.

Mr. COX. There are two circulars and I think both of them ought to be printed. I think they are both extremely valuable documents.

Mr. STEENERSON. It only consists of eight pages, and it gives instruction to farmers how to form these farm-loan associations.

Mr. COX. The Agricultural Department has recently gotten out a circular very much akin to that.

Mr. FOSTER. How are these to be distributed, through the folding or the document room?

Mr. STEENERSON. Through the document room.

Mr. FOSTER. They ought to be distributed through the folding room.

Mr. MANN. And they ought to be printed by the commission.

Mr. STAFFORD. Representatives from the city districts have no desire for these documents. It is a pure waste of them to put them in the folding room. Let them be distributed through the commission so Members can get what they wish.

Mr. FOSTER. I am not in favor of printing this as a House document and distributing the copies through the commission. If they are printed by the House we ought to give them to Members and not to the commission.

Mr. ADAMSON. If the gentleman from Wisconsin does not want the copies, if he will give them to me I will see that they are used.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker, I will ask that they be distributed through the folding room.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota adds to his request the provision that they be distributed through the folding room.

Mr. STEENERSON. Is that satisfactory to the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. STAFFORD. Satisfactory, with an objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. I object.

Mr. STEENERSON. I made the request for them to be distributed through the folding room understanding that that would be satisfactory to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. STAFFORD. I said satisfactory, with an objection. I have no objection to their being distributed through the document room.

Mr. STEENERSON. Then, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to change my request and have them distributed through the document room.

Mr. FOSTER. I object.

THE EIGHT-HOUR DAY.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by publishing a short editorial in to-day's New York World entitled "A rule-or-ruin policy."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by publishing a short editorial from the New York World entitled "A rule-or-ruin policy." Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The editorial is as follows:

A RULE-OR-RUIN POLICY.

In unison that suggests a cheer leader, railroad presidents are chanting, "The eight-hour day will increase the cost of living." It is a reckless cry, because they do not know. It is a wicked cry, because it plays into the hands of conscienceless men who find no excuse too silly for combinations to raise prices unduly.

The new basis does not go into effect until January 1. No one knows what its effect will be. No credible estimate puts the cost as high as 2 per cent of railroad revenue; union men say less than 1 per cent. The added cost will be but a fraction of the increase in railroad earnings since 1914; but a fraction of the vast sums saved by the use of bigger engines and longer trains.

At the highest guess, the new wage basis will cost less per ton-mile than the labor cost of moving freight per ton-mile 20 years ago. Are all railroad managers, like most railroad presidents, bankers' clerks? Has inventive skill died in their business? Can there be no more economies of operation? If the old instinct for efficiency survives, the new rule may in the end add nothing even to present labor cost. It is only honest dealing to wait for facts.

An unnecessary railroad embargo on perishable goods for a strike that never came gave food sharks a chance to put prices up. Railroad executives who talk as most of them talk to-day give extortioners an excuse for keeping prices up, still in anticipation of what may never happen. Sore at defeat, they forget that the most unwise of all policies is a policy of rule or ruin.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the Texas situation.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the Texas situation. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

FEDERAL ROADS IN FOREST RESERVES.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that there be printed as a House document the rules and regulations by the Secretary of Agriculture under section 8 of the Federal-aid roads, forest reserve.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent that there be printed as a House document a circular issued by the Secretary of Agriculture on the Federal roads aid in forest reserves.

Mr. FOSTER. Reserving the right to object, will these go through the folding room or the document room?

Mr. RAKER. How does the gentleman want them to go?

Mr. FOSTER. Through the folding room.

Mr. RAKER. Then, Mr. Speaker, I ask that they be distributed through the folding room.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not want them to go where any one man can grab the whole of them.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, what is it that the gentleman wishes to print as a House document?

Mr. RAKER. These are the rules and regulations under section 8 of the Federal-aid road act to carry out the building of roads in forest reserves.

Mr. STAFFORD. Three-quarters of the Members are not interested in them, and they will only encumber the quota of Members in the folding room, and I object.

WESTERN SOUTH DAKOTA.

Mr. GANDY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the legislation and departmental affairs affecting western South Dakota.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Dakota asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on legislation on departmental affairs in western South Dakota. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Two or three weeks ago I asked unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD. I wish to ask what is the limit of time on such leave.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman got general leave, he can extend remarks at any time this side of the 4th of March.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. SLEMP. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

FEDERAL AID TO ROADS IN FOREST RESERVES.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I renew my request to have the rules and regulations printed under section 8 of the Federal-aid roads act as a public document, to be distributed through the document room.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman why not distribute them through the folding room?

Mr. RAKER. There are only 16 public-land States and a few others, and a good many gentlemen have no use for them, but the people in the West want them.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I thought the gentleman wanted to print the rules for the operation of the general road act.

Mr. RAKER. Oh, no; only section 8, relating to forest reserves.

The SPEAKER. How does the gentleman want these distributed?

Mr. RAKER. Through the document room.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, are these regulations in reference to the appropriation that was made for the forest reserves?

Mr. RAKER. Only section 8.

Mr. MANN. My question is simple.

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. MANN. The department has gotten out the regulations. When do they intend to print them?

Mr. RAKER. In a week or so.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, every department of the Government has certain appropriations for printing purposes. They always want Congress to do their printing out of our congressional appropriation, if they can.

Mr. RAKER. No; that is not the purpose at all at this time.

Mr. MANN. I suspect that is the purpose.

Mr. RAKER. No; the purpose is that we may send these out immediately. The people are asking for them, and a limit of time as to when the first application should be filed is fixed, and they should know so that they can prepare their proper applications and be properly heard before the department.

Mr. MANN. Oh, the department will get out the regulations in time for the people to be heard. If they do not, they are not at all responsive to the duties, and I think they are fully capable of taking care of themselves.

Mr. RAKER. Let us have this as a public document.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman wants to have extra copies printed out of the congressional appropriation. The department has an appropriation for printing these. The departments ought to print such things as this out of their own appropriations. We appropriate a million dollars a year for this purpose for printing information.

Mr. RAKER. Two weeks ago there was printed as a public document a general circular letter as to how the funds would be distributed, and these are the rules and regulations as to handling the entire matter.

Mr. MANN. We probably ought not to have printed the first, but the department, finding out a way to get Congress to do their printing for them and pay for it out of our appropriation, ask us to do this whenever they can.

Mr. RAKER. That is not the purpose.

Mr. MANN. What is the purpose?

Mr. RAKER. The purpose is so that they can get these out to the people who want to see them now.

Mr. MANN. The Government Printing Office can print them just as quickly for the department as it can for Congress. The regulations are prepared by the department. It will not take any more time to print them for the department than it will if done for the Congress.

Mr. RAKER. If we get consent, we will have them ready to-morrow morning, and I hope the gentleman will not object.

Mr. MANN. The department can get them ready by to-morrow morning if it wants them printed by to-morrow morning, but they want us to pay for it out of our appropriation, and then people constantly talk of how extravagant Congress is about printing.

Mr. RAKER. The department is not responsible for this at all. This is done on my own responsibility after discussing the matter with a number of people. They want the information.

Mr. HILLIARD. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Colorado demands the regular order. The regular order is, Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin objects.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD upon the operation of the rural-credit law.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Idaho asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD upon the subject of the operation of the rural-credit law. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD upon the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Jersey asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD upon the state of the Union. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, I make the same request.

Mr. FARR. Mr. Speaker, I make the same request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama and the gentleman from Pennsylvania make similar requests.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, I make a similar request.

The SPEAKER. And the gentleman from Colorado makes a similar request. Is there objection to these four gentlemen extending their remarks in the RECORD?

There was no objection.

CALENDAR FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the first bill on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent.

OVERISSUE OF SECURITIES BY CARRIERS.

The first business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 563) to amend section 20 of an act to regulate commerce, to prevent overissues of securities by carriers, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, there are some gentlemen who are not present who desire to be heard upon this bill when it is considered. I hope the gentleman in charge will ask to have it passed over without prejudice.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, the author of the bill, Mr. RAYBURN, is present, and I will ask his attention. The suggestion is that the first bill on the calendar be passed over without prejudice.

Mr. RAYBURN. I have no objection.

Mr. ADAMSON. Then, Mr. Speaker, I make that request.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the bill will be passed over without prejudice. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

METALLIFEROUS MINERALS ON INDIAN RESERVATIONS.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 12426) to authorize mining for metalliferous minerals on Indian reservations in the State of Arizona.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, this bill was passed over on my objection two weeks ago, or when we last called the Calendar for Unanimous Consent. In the meantime I have given further consideration to the measure and have had the benefit of the counsel of the author of the bill. I understand that he is willing to reduce the term of years provided in the bill for which a lease may be made from 50 years to 30 years.

Mr. HAYDEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. STAFFORD. And also to leave it discretionary with the Secretary of the Interior to charge a royalty greater than 5 per cent on the gross value of the output of the minerals.

Mr. HAYDEN. Yes; amend by making the royalty not less than 5 per cent.

Mr. STAFFORD. And in the discretion of the Secretary.

Mr. HAYDEN. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. I believe I am correct in saying that it is the purpose of the gentleman, so far as he can see to it, that if these amendments are adopted when the bill is sent to conference and becomes enacted into law, that they will be adhered to.

Mr. HAYDEN. I will do my best to maintain the judgment of the House in this matter.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation under that condition.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. This bill is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and hereby is, authorized and empowered, under general regulations to be fixed by him and under such terms and conditions as he may prescribe, not inconsistent with the terms of this act, to lease to citizens of the United States or to any association of such persons or to any corporation organized under the laws of the United States or of any State or Territory thereof, any part of the unallotted lands within any Indian reservation in the State of Arizona heretofore withdrawn from entry under the mining laws for the purpose of mining for deposits of gold, silver, copper, and other valuable metalliferous minerals, which leases shall be irrevocable, except as herein provided, but which may be declared null and void upon breach of any of their terms.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. STAFFORD. The bill is being considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union by sections. Is it in order for amendments to a section to be considered at the conclusion of the reading of each section?

The SPEAKER. No; the bill has not been read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That from and after 90 days after the passage and approval of this act all unallotted lands within Indian reservations in the State of Arizona heretofore withdrawn from entry under the mining laws shall at all times be open to exploration for and discovery of deposits of gold, silver, copper, and other valuable metalliferous minerals by citizens of the United States and mining claims may be located by such citizens in the same manner as mining claims are located under the mining laws of the United States: Provided, That the locators of all such mining claims, or their heirs, successors, or assigns, shall have a preference right to apply to the Secretary of the Interior for a lease, under the terms and conditions of this act, within one year after the date of the location of any mining claim, and any such locator who shall fail to apply for a lease within one year from the date of location shall forfeit all rights to such mining claim: Provided further, That duplicate copies of the location notice shall be filed within 60 days with the superintendent in charge of the reservation on which the mining claim is located, and that application for a lease under this act may be filed with such superintendent for transmission through official channels to the Secretary of the Interior.

SEC. 3. That leases under this act shall be for a period of 50 years, with the preferential right in the lessee to renew the same for successive periods of 10 years upon such reasonable terms and conditions as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior, unless otherwise provided by law at the time of the expiration of such periods: Provided, That the lessee may, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, be permitted at any time to make written relinquishment of all rights under such a lease, and upon acceptance thereof be thereby relieved of all future obligations under said lease.

SEC. 4. That in addition to areas of mineral land to be included in leases under this act the Secretary of the Interior, in his discretion, may grant to the lessee the right to use, during the life of the lease, a tract of unoccupied land, not exceeding 20 acres in area, for camp sites, milling, smelting, and refining works, and for other purposes connected with and necessary to the proper development and use of the deposits covered by the lease.

SEC. 5. That the Secretary of the Interior, in his discretion, in making any lease under this act, may reserve to the United States the right to lease, sell, or otherwise dispose of the surface of the lands embraced within such lease under existing law or laws hereafter enacted, in so far as said surface is not necessary for use of the lessee in extracting and removing the deposits therein: Provided, That the said Secretary, during the life of the lease, is hereby authorized to issue such permits for easements herein provided to be reserved.

SEC. 6. That any successor in interest or assignee of any lease granted under this act, whether by voluntary transfer, judicial sale, foreclosure sale, or otherwise, shall be subject to all the conditions of the approval under which such rights are held and also subject to all the provisions and conditions of this act to the same extent as though such successor or assign were the original lessee hereunder.

SEC. 7. That any lease granted under this act may be forfeited and canceled by appropriate proceedings in the United States district court for the district in which said property or some part thereof is situated whenever the lessee, after reasonable notice in writing, as prescribed in the lease, shall fail to comply with the terms of this act or with such conditions not inconsistent herewith as may be specifically recited in the lease.

SEC. 8. That for the privilege of mining or extracting the mineral deposits in the ground covered by the lease the lessee shall pay to the United States, for the benefit of the Indians, a royalty which shall be 2 per cent of the gross value of the output of the minerals at the mine, due and payable at the end of each month succeeding that of the extraction of the minerals from the mine, and an annual rental, payable at the date of such lease and annually thereafter on the area covered by such lease, at the rate of 25 cents per acre for the first calendar year thereafter; 50 cents per acre for the second, third, fourth, and fifth years, respectively; and $1 per acre for each and every year thereafter during the continuance of the lease, except that such rental for any year shall be credited against the royalties as they accrue for that year.

SEC. 9. That in addition to the payment of the royalties and rentals as herein provided the lessee shall expend annually not less than $100 in development work for each mining claim located or leased in the same manner as an annual expenditure for labor or improvements is required to be made under the mining laws of the United States.

SEC. 10. That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to examine the books and accounts of lessees, and to require them to submit statements, representations, or reports, including information as to cost of mining, all of which statements, representations, or reports so required shall be upon oath, unless otherwise specified, and in such form and upon such blanks as the Secretary of the Interior may require; and any person making any false statement, representation, or report under oath shall be subject to punishment as for perjury.

SEC. 11. That all moneys received from royalties and rentals under the provisions of this act shall be deposited in the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the Indians belonging and having tribal rights on the reservation where the leased land is located, which moneys shall be at all times subject to appropriation by Congress for their education, support, and civilization.

SEC. 12. That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to perform any and all acts and to make such rules and regulations not inconsistent with this act as may be necessary and proper for the protection of the interests of the Indians and for the purpose of carry the provisions of this act into full force and effect: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed or held to affect the right of the State or other local authority to exercise any rights which they may have to levy and collect taxes upon improvements, output of mines, or other rights, property, or assets of any lessee.

The committee amendments were read, as follows:

Amend, on page 2, line 1, by striking out the words "in the State of Arizona".

Amend, page 2, by striking out all of section 2 from line 7 down to and including line 13, and inserting the following:

"SEC. 2. That after the passage and approval of this act unallotted lands within Indian reservations heretofore withheld from disposition under the mining laws may be declared by the Secretary of the Interior to be subject to exploration for and discovery of deposits of gold, silver, copper, and other valuable metalliferous minerals by citizens of the United States, and after such declaration mining claims may be."

Amend, on page 4, line 2, by striking out the word "twenty" and inserting "eighty."

Amend, on page 5, in line 9, by striking out "two" and inserting "five."

Amend, on page 6, in line 24, by striking out the word "carry" and inserting the word "carrying."

Amend, on page 7, by inserting a new section, as follows:

"SEC. 13. That the provisions of this act shall not apply to the Five Civilized Tribes and Osage Nation of Indians in Oklahoma."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendments.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say a word on that. Does this amendment of the committee striking out the word "Arizona"—I have not got a copy of the bill—open up all the Indian lands in this country?

Mr. HAYDEN. This bill provides for a system of leasing Indian lands for mining for metalliferous minerals, which will apply to all the States containing Indian reservations except the Five Civilized Tribes and the Osage Nation in Oklahoma.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. And opens up how many millions of acres of land? I am told 30,000,000.

Mr. HAYDEN. There are over 19,000,000 acres of land in Arizona that will be affected. Yes; I think probably about 30,000,000 acres altogether, two-thirds of it in my State and about 10,000,000 acres outside of Arizona.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Well, I only have this comment to make: This is no time, in my judgment, to be opening up in this way, by unanimous consent, 30,000,000 acres of land for prospecting without any more discussion than we are going to have here on this bill. That sort of legislation ought not to go through the House of Representatives. If I had known of this amendment, I would have objected to the consideration of it at such a time as this. The bill ought not to pass the House under such circumstances, first naming Arizona and then, after getting unanimous consent, to put in a committee amendment here opening up altogether about 30,000,000 acres of land belonging to the Indians to be run over by prospectors looking for anything they want to look for. That ought not to be the way to legislate for this country.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, I will state to the gentleman from Wisconsin that as introduced this bill applied to the State of Arizona only, and it was at the suggestion of the Department of the Interior that the change was made making it apply to all the Western States. As far as I am concerned, my chief interest is to see the bill apply to Arizona, because I know the conditions in my State, and I am satisfied that this bill is workable there.

No one who is at all familiar with the facts doubts that valuable deposits of gold, silver, copper, and other metalliferous minerals are to be found in the various Indian reservations in Arizona and the other Western States. The existence of many of such deposits has been known for many years, but in the absence of suitable legislation these resources have remained undeveloped. Without either the skill or the capital that is required to conduct successful mining operations, it has been impossible for the Indians to obtain any benefit from the minerals that lie unused in their lands. I have therefore introduced this bill in the hope that it will provide a workable plan whereby the mining industry, particularly of my own State, will be promoted for the benefit of the Indians and the white people alike.

You will note that this act applies only to Indian lands that have been heretofore withdrawn from entry under the mining laws, so that it will in no way interfere with mining on any Indian reservation where the same is now authorized by existing law. This is likewise true of reservations where the title to the mineral in the lands has not passed to the Indians, as in the case of the Papago Reservation in Arizona. When that reservation was created the President wisely determined that the Papagos had acquired no right to the minerals in their country, because they have made no attempt to mine them, and in the Executive order establishing the Papago Reservation it is specifically stated that the mineral lands within the reservation are to remain open to entry under the mining laws. It would have been much better if such a provision had been included in the Executive orders by which the other reservations were created; but this was not done, so that the minerals have been given to the Indians, and there is now no other way to proceed except to recognize their ownership.

I am well aware that there are many Members of the House who object to the adoption of a leasing system, and I am in accord with them in opposing the payment of royalties for the privilege of mining for metalliferous minerals on the public domain. We must not forget, however, that the lands which may be leased under the provisions of this bill are the tribal property of the Indians and that it has not been the policy of the Government to permit mining on Indian reservations under the general mining laws except in the case of the Papago Reservation, to which I have just referred. Since the lands in all of the other reservations have been set aside for the exclusive use and benefit of the Indians we must recognize that they are entitled to receive the same income from their property as any other private proprietor.

So far as the Indians are concerned, now is the opportune time to pass this bill. The present high prices that are received for all of the metals makes it certain that the enactment of the measure into law will mean the immediate development of many valuable mines, so that the Indians will soon be receiving an income from royalties and rentals that will be of great assistance in advancing their civilization. I am satisfied that within a very few years after this bill is in operation a number of Indian tribes will be receiving enough money from this source to provide for their education and support, so that it will be no longer necessary for Congress to appropriate funds from the Treasury for this purpose.

I used as the basis for this bill the two conservation measures which have twice passed this House, once in the Sixty-third Congress and again in this Congress, the water-power bill and the oil and coal leasing bill, known as the Ferris bills. I took the sections which were applicable to metalliferous mining, and there is no proposition in this bill which has not been debated for days in the last two Congresses. All of the safeguards against waste or monopoly to be found in the Ferris bills are contained in this bill for the benefit of the Indians. There is nothing new or novel in it.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Does the gentleman say that the provisions relating to leasing are substantially those that were in the Ferris water-power bill when we passed that bill?

Mr. HAYDEN. Not only substantially but actually taken word for word from the Ferris bill. If the gentleman desires to ask me about any section of this bill, I can tell him where it comes from in the conservation bills.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I have not been able to get a copy of the bill. I sent for it three times, and the boys brought me something else each time.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Two bills of this character have heretofore passed the House giving the Secretary of the Interior the full right to lease these lands under certain rules and regulations that he might prescribe.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. As I understand, Mr. Speaker, the Ferris bill laid down with much particularity the terms and conditions under which the Secretary could lease, but the gentleman from Texas has just said that the terms and conditions were to be left to the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. HAYDEN. That was the bill authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to issue revocable permits for mining on Indian reservations.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. In the Sixty-first Congress it passed the House and was defeated in the Senate.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. No such discretion ought to be vested in any executive officer. We often use here the old expression, "This is a government of laws and not of men," but if there is anything that will make it a government of men and not of laws it is to give executive officers unlimited discretion in the disposition of public property.

Mr. HAYDEN. I am in hearty accord with the gentleman.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. That was probably the reason for its defeat in the Senate This is a meritorious bill, however.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Arizona has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, after the committee amendments are passed upon I desire to offer some amendments.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendments.

The question was taken, and the amendments were agreed to.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, on page 3, line 12, I move to strike out "fifty" and insert "thirty."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 12, strike out the word "fifty" and insert "thirty."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, several Members of the House have given very thorough consideration to this bill. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] and myself have on former occasions asked to have this bill passed over without prejudice, so that thorough consideration could be given it. At the last meeting, when we considered the Unanimous Consent Calendar, I was opposed to certain provisions in this bill, and particularly this, which granted the Secretary of the Interior the right to impose on the unallotted lands of Indians of this country without their consent or approval a lease for 50 years. The gentleman from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN] has consented to accept an amendment to substitute 30 years for 50 years. I realize that you could not limit it to 10, or perhaps 20, years, and thereby get sufficient capital to develop these large mines that may be developed on these unallotted Indian lands, but certainly 30 years is a reasonable time to grant as initial tenure in view of the other right that the lessees will have for a renewal for successive 10-year periods under the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask one more question. When the report was read there was some statement about something being irrevocable. What was the word "irrevocable" used in connection with?

Mr. HAYDEN. That language is taken directly from the first section of H. R. 408, the Ferris water-power bill. It says:

Which leases shall be irrevocable, except as herein provided, but which may be declared null and void upon breach of any of their terms.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. It is irrevocable during 30 years?

Mr. HAYDEN. Yes; except for a breach of the terms of the lease.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I wish to offer another amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. STAFFORD: Page 5, line 9, after the word "which," insert "in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior"; after the word "shall" insert "in"; and after the word "be" insert "less than."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, this amendment, if adopted, will make the line read as follows:

A royalty which, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, shall not be less than 5 per cent.

This is an amendment that was accepted by the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN], so as to vest in the Secretary of the Interior the discretion in case it is obviously a rich mine, and one where the profits will be great, to exact a larger royalty than 5 per cent. The bill as originally drawn fixes an absolute royalty of 5 per cent, and this is to grant, as I said, to the Secretary of the Interior the right to exact a larger royalty if he sees fit.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, there is another question I would like to ask the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I notice that the letter of the Secretary of the Interior approving the bill H. R. 12426 is dated April 16 of the present year.

Mr. HAYDEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Were any amendments made by the committee or recommended by the committee which were not approved by the Secretary of the Interior?

Mr. HAYDEN. No. We adopted all of the amendments suggested by the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. And any other?

Mr. HAYDEN. The only other amendment adopted was that on page 4, which enlarges the area which may be leased for camp sites, milling, smelting, and refining works, from 20 to 80 acres. That is the only committee amendment which was not suggested in the Secretary's report.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. An increase from 20 to 80 acres?

Mr. HAYDEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. That is quite an enlargement.

Mr. HAYDEN. Well, when the matter came up for consideration in the committee it was thought that the Secretary ought to have discretion to lease not more than 80 acres of the surface for this purpose. He might not lease more than 10 acres, but he is allowed discretion to lease not to exceed 80 acres.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the title will be amended to conform to the text.

There was no objection.

On motion of Mr. HAYDEN, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arizona asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HAYDEN. In accordance with the permission granted me, I desire to extend my remarks by printing in the RECORD the following memorial passed by the Second Legislature of the State of Arizona, favoring legislation by Congress which will permit mining within Indian reservations:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

Your memorialist, the Second Legislature of the State of Arizona, respectfully represents:

That the several Indian reservations in the State of Arizona now embrace large areas of mineral land, which, under present regulations, are not open to location as mineral claims, and are valueless as tillable or agricultural land; and

Whereas the opening of these mineral lands in these aforesaid reservations to entry as mineral claims by prospectors, miners, and legitimate mining companies will hasten the development of the State and at the same time give employment to the Indians on the reservations in road building and other departments of work and make them more self-supporting; and

Whereas the opening of these claims to mining will develop water in many heretofore arid portions of the State and improve the value of said lands for grazing, to which they are now allotted: Therefore

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the State of Arizona, That the Congress of the United States is hereby petitioned and urged to enact such legislation as may be necessary to open to entry and location the mineral lands embraced within the confines of these aforesaid Indian reservations by bona fide prospectors and miners, subject to the same regulations governing mineral lands on other public domain: Provided however, That this petition shall not be so construed as to permit any person, company, or corporation to enter in or upon large tracts of land in these reservations for any purpose other than mining as hereinbefore stated: And provided further, That no land other than mineral lands, as defined in the mineral laws of the United States pertaining thereto, shall be included within the provisions of this petition; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this memorial and these resolutions be forwarded to the President of the United States, the President of the Senate, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, the honorable Secretary of the Interior, and the Representatives of Arizona in Congress; and that our Representatives in Congress be, and they are hereby, requested to do all in their power to accomplish the enactment of such legislation.

Passed the house February 19, 1915, by a vote of 30 ayes, 1 no, none absent, 4 excused.

WM. E. BROOKS,
Speaker of the House.

Passed the senate February 25, 1915, by a vote of 19 ayes, no noes, none absent, none excused.

W. P. SIMS, President.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of the tariff.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the subject of the tariff. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STEPHENS of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the administration's legislative program.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Nebraska asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the administration's legislative program. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

STANDARDS OF CLASSIFICATION FOR COTTON.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next bill.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 15913) to authorize the Secretary of Agriculture to establish uniform standards of classification for cotton; to provide for the application, enforcement, and use of such standards in transactions in interstate and foreign commerce, to prevent deception therein, and for other purposes.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, this is too important a bill to be considered on the Unanimous Consent Calendar. I ask unanimous consent that it be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that the bill be passed over without prejudice. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

GRANTING PUBLIC LANDS TO OKLAHOMA.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 15156) granting public lands to the State of Oklahoma.

The title of the bill was read.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent that the bill be passed over without prejudice. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

LEAVE TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to address the House for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to me for a moment to make a request?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes; I yield.

Mr. MANN. Just a second.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. MANN. When the session of last Saturday closed I believe there were a number of cases where gentlemen had obtained leave to address the House, and that leave expired on Saturday. I ask unanimous consent that those orders be made continuing orders, subject to the usual provision.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the orders heretofore made about certain gentlemen having leave to make speeches be a continuing order. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

THE EIGHT-HOUR DAY.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, on Friday last the House was in a state of mental turmoil with respect to the President's recommendations upon the so-called strike situation, and a vote was finally taken which was supposed to relieve the people of the United States from the strike that was to have occurred this morning at 7 o'clock. Action in another body confirming a majority of the Members of the House, has since been approved by the President of the United States, and we now have as a law the Adamson bill (H. R. 17700), which provides that, "beginning January 1, 1917, eight hours shall in contracts for labor and service be deemed a day's work," and also providing for a commission of three, who shall investigate as to eight-hour labor conditions, and report.

That is substantially as far as the law goes, leaving the whole question as between the employers and the employees up in the air; leaving the men free to strike if they want to, or the employers free to lock out the men if they so desire. By this law we have simply postponed for a period of several months the impending catastrophe which worried the President and embarrassed Congress.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. We have not made a permanent law, so far as the menace of a strike is concerned. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. FESS. This law is called an "eight-hour law."

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania It is.

Mr. FESS. What is the meaning of eight hours as interpreted by this? Does it mean that when the eight hours are up, the men stop work?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. As interpreted, from what I have read in the newspapers as coming from the leaders of the brotherhoods, it means a 25 per cent wage increase, and that is all it means. It means practically no change in the working conditions at all.

Mr. FESS. It is not, then, a humanitarian move to limit the hours of labor, as suggested by the President in his message?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Well, if it was, the President has not lived up to his own suggestion—which is the very point I am about to make to the House.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Unless I can get more time I shall not be able to yield. This question arose through the insistence of the President of the United States acting as a mediator, in spite of the law creating a Board of Mediation and Conciliation. From what was said by organization leaders on the floor of the House, and from what was reported elsewhere, it appeared that the President had "butted into" the conferences that were being held between employers and employees in New York, or while mediation with a view to settlement without legislation was pending. I say "settlement without legislation" because it is established doctrine of union labor that they do not want eight hours by law. The unions want to be left free to act on the eight-hour question in their own way. In other words, the labor unions at the present time, as shown by the action of the American Federation of Labor in San Francisco last year, prefer that the legislative bodies shall keep their hands off the question of wages and hours. These resolutions I quoted last Saturday.

Now, then, in a panic this great Congress of the United States ran to cover on the strike question, because the President of the United States wanted to relieve himself of the responsibility that he had brought upon his own shoulders by taking over the matter of mediation with the Board of Mediation and Conciliation then upon the ground.

After he failed as mediator—a voluntary office which he assumed as no other President had done—the President of the United States came into this House and told us what he wanted us to do. He brought his speech down to certain concrete recommendations and asked for immediate action. What did he want? First, the enlargement and reorganization of the Interstate Commerce Commission along the lines embodied in the bill recently passed by the House of Representatives and now awaiting action by the Senate, in order that the commission might be enabled to deal with the many great and various duties now devolving upon it with a promptness and fairness which under its present constitution would be practically impossible.

The chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce and the majority of the House, which is now proceeding to business "calmly after the storm," seems to think this question of disputes between the railroad employees and the railroads has been settled. I will ask the chairman, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON], for I see him present, what has been done by the Congress of the United States to live up to that recommendation of the President to increase the number of members of the Interstate Commerce Commission?

Mr. ADAMSON. Does the gentleman ask me that question and desire an answer?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I do.

Mr. ADAMSON. Then I will take pleasure in saying that the bill passed by the House of Representatives has nothing to do with that situation, and was never intended to have, and I am sorry that it has ever been mixed up with it by certain gentlemen; and I think the Senate—if I may be allowed to mention that body in polite company—ought to go ahead and pass that bill, because the Interstate Commerce Commission is actually in need of the assistance promised by that bill, without reference to any expected addition of work. [Applause.]

Now, further, I understand the gentleman has asked what has been accomplished. I can easily tell him that. This much has been accomplished: We have adopted a suggestion which we all understand, which everybody understands, and which ought to have been adopted in any bill, or anywhere at any time, and would have been at some time; and the suggestions of 10,000 different men about 10,000 different things that no two of us could agree on, or had the time to agree on, are postponed for further consideration. That is all there is to it. The statement that it is a bill to increase labor or take control of labor is without any foundation on earth. It merely provides that the status quo shall be maintained until the operation of this eight-hour law can be observed, and other legislation be had. Nobody need apprehend that the committee of which I am chairman, or the Congress of which I am a Member, or the American people, will ever disregard the rights of either class of servants. They are both our servants, working to maintain our great system of transportation, working to see that each class gets its dues. We can not do everything in a day. Rome was not built in a day. Probably the gentleman has heard that somewhere. But we did what we could with the light before us. Unfortunately it came up in a crisis. Unfortunately when the President made this plain, clear proposition to the two sets of men, the railroad managers were not patriotic enough to accept it. The other crowd did accept it. The sensible, plain, rational thing to do, then, to avert a strike, was simply to do what one crowd had agreed to do, that we all knew was right, that ought to be done, that would have been done at some time, and we did what we knew how to do and postponed what we differed on. That is all there is to it. There is no use of any political misrepresentations about it. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired. [Laughter.]

Mr. ADAMSON. The gentleman gave it to me of his own motion. He tempted me, and asked me to take advantage of it. I am willing that he should have more time now.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that he be allowed to proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I did not want to interrupt the gentleman from Georgia, because I think it is fair that he should make his statement. He had little chance, as few of us had, to make any statement here on Friday, when this bill was before the House. The gentleman may think this over, that in the passage of his bill he has imposed an obligation of $60,000,000——

Mr. ADAMSON. I deny that.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. He has imposed an obligation of $60,000,000 upon the American people generally in one year.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia must not interrupt without the consent of the gentleman who has the floor.

Mr. ADAMSON. He is willing to let me say that.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not know whether he is or not.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am willing. Perhaps the gentleman will deny that in the passage of this bill he has denied the right of arbitration to one side or the other.

Mr. ADAMSON. I do deny it. It is not true.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It is true.

Mr. ADAMSON. It is not.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia can not interrupt the gentleman who has the floor without his permission.

Mr. ADAMSON. He referred to me.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Perhaps the gentleman will deny that the President of the United States took one side of this controversy.

Mr. ADAMSON. I do deny that.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman tell me wherein the President of the United States permitted arbitration in which the employers might present their side of the eight-hour question?

Mr. ADAMSON. There was never a fairer or better balanced statement made anywhere than the proposition the President made to the two sides, in the interest of the American people, to whom the whole crowd belong, railroads and all. [Applause.] The position of a neutral is always misunderstood by the parties. Each side thinks he is taking the part of the other side, and that was so in this case, because he was fair and honest. Both sides ought to have accepted his proposition, for it was sensible and plain and fair and patriotic, and proposed just what ought to have been done. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair wants to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania a question.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I yield.

The SPEAKER When the gentleman from Pennsylvania asks any gentleman sitting in his seat a question, does he desire the gentleman to get up and answer it in his time?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I realize, Mr. Speaker, that the gentleman from Georgia did not comply with the rules by rising to answer my question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair wants to know whether the gentleman wants the Member whom he is interrogating to get up and answer the question in his time or wait until he gets through?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I intended that the gentleman from Georgia should have time to answer, and I yielded ample time to him in order that he might do so. I wanted to be fair. I know the gentleman from Georgia well, and appreciat highly his splendid ability, and I know that he was placed in a very peculiar position in this matter, and he ought to have an opportunity to explain all he cares to explain with regard to that bill. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I can not yield now.

Mr. ADAMSON. I have not asked for any opportunity to explain. I have no apology to make and nothing to explain, but I deny the things that I think are unjustly charged against this legislation or against the administration. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman wants to do in this matter what the President of the United States wants to have done, does he not?

Mr. ADAMSON. I do not know whether I do or not. I did not do what he first said he wanted done, and he came to Congress and agreed that I was right.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Then the gentleman evidently brought the President of the United States to terms.

Mr. ADAMSON. The President of the United States of America is a reasonable man, and when you talk sense to him he listens to it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman, rising in his place, tell me why the President of the United States makes six points that he desires Congress to act upon and the gentleman from Georgia and his party will accept only two of them?

Mr. ADAMSON. The President was acting on his traditional charitable fairness. He stated a system of what he as an individual thought might be right. I do not understand that he assumed to order or to ask anybody to do it all now. He said, "I have tried to adjust this matter, and one side refuses to adjust it. I wash my hands of it, and I turn it over to you," and turned it over to us, and we did what we did and he approved it. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will ask the gentleman one more question—whether he regards the eight-hour law passed Saturday and signed by the President on Sunday with four pens, which he gave the four brotherhood chieftains—whether he regards that as permanent law.

Mr. ADAMSON. I thought the gentleman was going to ask why he did not give the railroad managers four pens, and he will do it if they want them. The act that we passed is but partial; it did not undertake to build all of the system at once. We did not have time. The gentleman and I could not agree now in a week about the additional things that ought to be done.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will tell the gentleman what the President said, because I regard the action of the gentleman from Georgia, together with that of his colleagues on that side of the House, as being contrary to the recommendations of the President. The President has gone off to deliver an address taking over the Abraham Lincoln birthplace, satisfied that he has achieved a great political victory, but the President and the Congress have put the people of the United States in the position of accepting at the hands of Congress a makeshift law which may bring on a strike, not now when the weather is favorable, but in the wintertime when there would be a real calamity.

Mr. ADAMSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I can not now. I would like to yield to the gentleman, but I have only five minutes. I would like to yield, because I enjoy these interruptions. If the President is satisfied with that law, so mote it be. The President is satisfied only to this extent, and so are gentlemen on that side of the House, that they know it is a makeshift law which will cover up their tracks until after election; but for one I propose to let the facts be known so far as my feeble voice will carry throughout the land.

What did the President say when he came before the Congress, having failed as mediator, after taking the matter out of the hands of the Board of Mediation and Conciliation? He said:

> I was seeking to compose the present in order to safeguard the future.

That was not a makeshift proposition; he wanted "to safeguard the future." What was the matter with him? Was he scared about a strike that was going to happen at 7 o'clock this morning? I do not know whether it was going to happen or not. There have been a good many rumors that it was all understood; that it would not have happened at all. The gentleman from Georgia told us on July 15 that he knew about it four months ago. The President told us he knew about it a year ago. Was it staged to bring in this 7 o'clock Labor Day strike calamity just before election?

Mr. ADAMSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I can not just now. We got by the calamity strike at 7 o'clock this morning, but you have not got away from the prospect of a strike coming upon us somewhere in midwinter, when coal is scarce and there will be great difficulty in getting food and supplies for the people. The President said he was trying to "compose the present in order to safeguard the future." What has Congress done to "safeguard the future"? Nothing. All you have done is to legislate an eight-hour day.

Read what the President says in addition to establishing the eight-hour day.

Mr. ADAMSON. Will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

Mr. BORLAND. Reserving the right to object, I want to say that there are a good many gentlemen here who have bills on the calendar waiting to be considered.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will say that there is nothing more important before the country to-day than this legislation on this question and the strike and "safeguarding the future."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the gentleman continuing five minutes?

Mr. ADAMSON. Reserving the right to object, and I have no private objection, but the gentleman has made two propositions, one that this was a question of politics and the other that I knew about the strike four months ago, and unless he permits me to reply to those two suggestions I do not think he ought to go on.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am making this speech for the purpose of having the gentleman reply.

Mr. ADAMSON. But I do not want to reply in a speech, I want to reply and put the facts into the gentleman's speech. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania for five minutes more?

Mr. BORLAND. I will have to object.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I advise the gentleman not to object. The unanimous-consent bills are not equal in importance to this great proposition of "safeguarding the future" against calamity strikes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri objects.

Mr. BORLAND. I do not want to object, but the gentleman has had already 15 minutes.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have the gentleman have 5 minutes more, and I would like 10 minutes to reply to him.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. BORLAND. I have no personal objection, Mr. Speaker, and I will withdraw my objection, with the condition that the gentleman from Alabama may have 10 minutes, and that that may conclude this political debate.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Speaker, may I have 10 minutes in which to discuss this subject? I am not making that a condition.

The SPEAKER. The Chair wants to dispose of one thing at a time. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to proceed for five minutes?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object——

Mr. BORLAND. And the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] for 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Did the gentleman object?

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, I did not object. I want to follow the gentleman from Pennsylvania for 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. What the Chair desires to determine now is whether there is objection.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my objection.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, this is Labor Day. We met to-day primarily for the purpose of sending the deficiency appropriation bill to conference, and, secondarily, for the purpose of considering the Unanimous Consent Calendar for the last time at this session. My friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] has had 20 minutes, about 6 of which he has occupied himself. If we are going to have debate upon this subject all afternoon, I give notice now that when we get through I shall make the point of no quorum, and the Unanimous Consent Calendar can not come up at this time.

Mr. ADAMSON. I suggest that the gentleman make the point now.

Mr. MANN. I was hoping that gentlemen would be willing to let this debate go over until to-morrow morning, when there will be time, and when it will not interfere with consideration of the Unanimous Consent Calendar.

Mr. BORLAND. Would the gentleman from Pennsylvania be willing to proceed to-morrow?

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE], while he has the floor, continue for five minutes, and that then we take up the Calendar for Unanimous Consent, and that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON] address the House thereafter.

The SPEAKER. That is exactly what the Chair is trying to determine. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania that he proceed for five minutes more?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I shall ask not to be interrupted in order that I may use the five minutes myself. I desire to call to the attention of the House and of the country, which is vastly interested in this question this morning, the second proposition which the President made to the Congress, which was that we could have an eight-hour day as a legal basis for work. I admit that the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce has met that point and has covered it in the bill. The President's third point was for the authorization of the appointment by the President of a small body of men to observe the actual results and experience of the adoption of the eight-hour day, and I admit that the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce and the Congress has met that point of the President. That, however, is as far as the Congress of the United States has gone. It has done nothing with the proposition to increase the membership of the Interstate Commerce Commission to meet questions of this kind. The fourth proposition was for—> explicit approval by the Congress of the consideration by the Interstate Commerce Commission of an increase of freight rates to meet such additional expenditures by the railroads as may have been rendered necessary by the adoption of the eight-hour day and which have not been offset by administrative readjustments and economies should the facts disclosed justify the increase.

Pray tell me what the Congress has done to respond to this request that we grant legislation which, if the first proposition was agreed to—namely, increase in the pay of the men—that we also pass legislation to enable the railroads to increase freight charges to the people of the country?

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Not that I am in favor of increasing the rates——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has said that he did not want to be interrupted.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. But apparently the Congress of the United States was timorous of this question, and has refused to submit to the recommendation of the President of the United States to play fair to both sides. Why not take up the freight-rate recommendation of the President?

The fifth recommendation of the President was for—an amendment of the existing Federal statute which provides for mediation, conciliation, and arbitration of such controversies as the present by adding to it a provision that in case the methods of accommodation now provided for should fail a full public investigation of the merits of every such dispute shall be instituted and completed before a strike or lockout may lawfully be attempted.

What has the Congress done to meet this very important and necessary provision "for the future" which the President made as his excuse for coming into the Congress of the United States and asking support? Does not such a suggestion carry weight? The Republican minority of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce is not at fault; it brought in an amendment to the Adamson bill asking that this recommendation of the President be carried into effect "looking to the future"; but when the committee that had the power here was in full swing, with the force of the unions and the other influences behind them, they had no time to listen to mediation, no time to listen to conciliation, no time to listen to arbitration, no time to provide permanent law for the future, but insisted on going forward and passing an ex parte, special piece of legislation that threatens to impose great burdens upon all the people of the country. We heard very little about the details, but it is evident the committee overrode the more important of the President's recommendations.

Congress has run away from the important problem of "safeguarding the future"; it has simply temporized with the present, and yet here to-day, the day on which this great calamity was to befall us, without taking up the question of providing against a strike in December or in the dead of winter, the majority of this House complacently goes along passing unanimous-consent bills and other small matters, and considers it has done its full duty by the people of the United States. And the President apparently is satisfied.

Mr. Speaker, I charge that the party in power has run away from its full obligation to the people of the United States in this matter. It has satisfied itself with the fatuous notion that it has done its full duty by passing a makeshift law—a law temporary in character only—and it has left open until the dead of winter the problem of a great strike which may bring a real distress and a real calamity upon this country. Now, you gentlemen can answer. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for 10 minutes. I did not object to the gentleman from Pennsylvania proceeding for 25 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to speak for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I have no objection to the gentleman making his request for to-morrow.

Mr. HEFLIN. I prefer to proceed now. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has made an assault upon the administration——

Mr. MANN. And some one will want to follow the gentleman.

Mr. HEFLIN. Nobody will want to follow me on this side. The administration has been attacked, and I think that some Democrat in a Democratic House ought to have an opportunity to answer.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. BURNETT. It is a powerless attack. I do not think it amounts to anything.

The SPEAKER. This is not debatable. The gentleman from Illinois objects.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Alabama have 10 minutes, and thereafter all speeches be confined to the bills under consideration to-day.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Alabama have 10 minutes and that the speeches for the rest of the day shall be confined to the bills under consideration.

Mr. MANN. Oh, nobody can prevent another unanimous-consent request being made.

The SPEAKER. That is the absolute fact.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman from Alabama speak to-morrow?

Mr. HEFLIN. I want to follow the gentleman from Philadelphia now. We have given him 25 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I object.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Alabama may proceed for 10 minutes in the morning, immediately following the reading of the Journal, and that after him the gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON] may have 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] asks unanimous consent that to-morrow morning, after the reading of the Journal and the clearing up of the business on the Speaker's table, the gentleman from Alabama have 10 minutes, to be followed by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON], subject, of course, to conference reports and things of that sort. Is there objection?

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask that I be permitted to have 10 minutes following the gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to the other two going on in the morning, but there are a number of gentlemen who have time set for to-morrow. After that the gentleman could come in.

Mr. BARKLEY. That is up to the House, of course.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I want to appeal to the sense of fairness of the gentleman from Illinois, that the gentleman from Alabama be permitted to proceed for 10 minutes at this time. A number of us had no objection to listening to the gentleman from Pennsylvania speak for 25 minutes.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania did not speak for 12 minutes. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] consumed more than half the time.

Mr. GARRETT. The gentleman from Pennsylvania had 25 minutes of time. If he yielded to the gentleman from Georgia, that was his matter. The gentleman from Pennsylvania was making a political speech——

Mr. MANN. Which, I think, ought not to have been interjected.

Mr. GARRETT. I suggest to the gentleman from Illinois that it is extremely unfair now to object to unanimous consent being given to enable the gentleman to reply to a political speech.

Mr. MANN. I think it is very unfair for the gentleman from Tennessee to make such a statement.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request?

Mr. MANN. I shall object to any extraneous matter the rest of the day by anybody. [Applause.]

Mr. GARRETT. The gentleman chooses his time for making such an objection.

Mr. MANN. I choose the right time, the decent time.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT]?

Mr. MANN. He made no request. He endeavored to give a lecture; that is all.

Mr. GARRETT. No; I had appealed to the sense of fairness of the gentleman from Illinois. I thought he possessed it.

Mr. MANN. Well, I did possess it, but the gentleman from Tennessee has an exaggerated notion.

The SPEAKER. All this debate is entirely out of order. The Clerk will report the next bill.

Mr. ROUSE. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Illinois rise?

Mr. ROUSE. To ask to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the Postal Service.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

THE VIRUS, SERUM, AND TOXIN ACT.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 15914) to authorize the Secretary of Agriculture to license establishments for and to regulate the preparation of viruses, serums, toxins, and analogous products for use in the treatment of domestic animals, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, there are several gentlemen who want to be heard on this bill and there are a number of amendments to be offered to it. Unless it is asked to be passed over I shall have to object.

The SPEAKER. Who is managing this bill?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to pass the bill over without prejudice. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

UNCOMPAHGRE INDIAN RESERVATION.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 43) in relation to the location, entry, and patenting of lands within the former Uncompahgre Indian Reservation, in the State of Utah, containing gilsonite or other like substances, and for other purposes.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object——

Mr. MAYS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Does this mean it is to be called up again this session?

Mr. MAYS. Probably not, but it retains its place on the calendar.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. A parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it. I say that there is no chance, if we pass it over without prejudice, to call it up again at this session unless we stay here until two weeks from to-day.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. That is satisfactory to me.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it will be passed over without prejudice.

There was no objection.

SIOUX CLAIMS.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 437!) authorizing the Sioux Tribe of Indians to submit claims to the Court of Claims.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, unless the gentleman wants to have it passed over, I will object.

Mr. GANDY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this number on the calendar and the next one, H. R. 10774, may be passed over without prejudice, due to the fact that there is objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Dakota asks unanimous consent that this bill and the next one, H. R. 10774, be passed over without prejudice. Is there objection. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

IMPORTATION OF VIRUSES, SERUMS, ETC.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 199) to regulate the importation of viruses, serums, toxins, and analogous products, to regulate interstate traffic in said articles, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Speaker, unless they desire to have this bill go over, I think I shall object.

Mr. ADAMSON. I do not want it to go off the calendar. Will the gentleman reserve his objection?

Mr. BENNET. I understand that if I do not object others will. Therefore, I object.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, then I ask that the bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

EXPENSES, JOINT ENCAMPMENT, AUGUSTA, GA.

The next business in order on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 708) to make immediately available for the use of the State of Georgia in paying expenses incurred by said State in connection with the joint encampment held at Augusta, Ga., July 22 to 31, 1914, certain sums appropriated for arming and equipping the militia of said State.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I am not interested in the bill. I had this passed over several times in order to get additional information in reference to it. The bill does not contain so very much information on its face. Under the Revised Statutes, section 1661, there is a permanent annual appropriation for the benefit of certain things in the National Guard. That statute has been amended so as to increase the amount of the appropriation and pay for additional things out of the appropriation. The National Guard of Georgia was called into encampment and there was an understanding that certain expenses would be paid. The appropriation for that fiscal year was not sufficient to pay all of the expenses, although they were incurred. The National Guard now asks that the balance that is due may be paid out of the amount that would go to the State of Georgia for the ensuing fiscal year. The War Department very urgently requests that that be done. I have a letter from the Secretary of War in response to a letter which I wrote to him upon the subject.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, there is nothing in the report whatsoever to give a Member any clear idea as to the real purpose of this proposal. The explanation of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] explains it is similar to other cases for which we have made provision. I therefore withdraw the reservation.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois and the gentleman from Georgia if there is anything in this request that would not readily be granted by the War Department?

Mr. ADAMSON. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. I will read this statement, which is a portion of the letter which the Secretary of War wrote to me:

> The State of Georgia did not, at the end of the fiscal year 1915, have any funds remaining to its credit from the appropriation under section 1661, Revised Statutes, to meet the expense involved at the joint camp of instruction at Augusta, Ga., July, 1914, but has now sufficient funds remaining from the appropriation in question from the fiscal year 1916. These funds for the fiscal year 1916, however, under a ruling of the Comptroller of the Treasury, are not available for an indebtedness incurred prior to the year for which appropriated.
> No precedent would be created in using the funds appropriated under section 1661, Revised Statutes, for the purpose of transportation, which is an authorized expense against these funds, but the purpose of the bill is, it is understood, to authorize the expenditure of these funds appropriated for the fiscal year 1916 for an authorized expenditure, but which can not be made in view of the comptroller's decision referred to in paragraph 2.

Mr. BENNET. It is simply a situation in which any State might find itself. Illinois or New York might have to make a similar request.

Mr. MANN. They might, but they probably would not. The fact is, I am told, the expense of the encampment of 1915, probably owing to the military feeling throughout the world, was greater than anticipated, because more troops came, and they ran over the expense allowed under the appropriation for that year. Now, they would be entitled to have the appropriation for 1916. This simply authorizes them to use that for part of the expenses of 1915.

Mr. BENNET. In view of the explanation of the gentleman from Illinois, I shall not object, but the report absolutely contains no information from which you can form an opinion for or against the bill.

Mr. MANN. I will say to the gentleman if he will look up section 1661 of the Revised Statutes as it was he would be opposed to the bill, but that section has been amended to cover these cases, although that is not referred to.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I am very much obliged to the gentleman from Illinois for his valuable services and wish to thank him in behalf of my State.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that it be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is in doubt as to whether he ever put the request of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] to speak 10 minutes to-morrow morning, so he puts the request now. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. That to-day or to-morrow?

The SPEAKER. To-morrow. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Be it enacted, etc., That the sum appropriated by section 1661, Revised Statutes, for arming and equipping the whole body of the militia, the sum of $14,409.98, proportioned to the State of Georgia for the year 1915 and 1916 be, and the same is hereby, made immediately available for the purpose of paying the expenses incurred by said State over and above the allotments made by the Secretary of War to the State of Georgia from all appropriations therefor in connection with the joint encampment held at Augusta, Ga., July 22 to 31, 1914; and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and instructed to pay over said amount to the governor of said State of Georgia for said purpose.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. ADAMSON, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. HARRISON). The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

TOWN SITES IN CONNECTION WITH IRRIGATION PROJECTS.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 15958) to amend an act providing for the withdrawal from public entry of lands deeded for town sites in connection with irrigation projects.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. BORLAND. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I do not see the author of the bill [Mr. SMITH of Idaho] here.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman is out for the moment. I hope the gentleman from Missouri will not object.

Mr. STAFFORD. The author of the bill was here a few minutes ago.

Mr. BORLAND. The author of the bill and I agreed to an amendment.

Mr. MONDELL. I do not think there is any serious objection to the amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 5 of an act entitled "An act providing for the withdrawal from public entry of lands needed for town-site purposes in connection with irrigation projects under the reclamation act of June 17, 1902, and for other purposes," approved April 16, 1906, as amended by the act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act providing for the withdrawal from public entry of lands needed for town-site purposes in connection with irrigation projects under the reclamation act of June 17, 1902, and for other purposes,' approved April 16, 1906," be amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 5. That whenever a development of power is necessary for the irrigation of lands, under any project undertaken under the said act, or any opportunity is afforded for the development of power under any such project, the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to lease for a period not exceeding 50 years, giving preference to irrigation districts duly organized under State law and to municipal purposes, any surplus power or power privilege, and the money derived from such leases shall be covered into the reclamation fund and be placed to the credit of the project from which said power is derived: Provided, That no lease shall be made for such surplus power or power privilege as will impair the efficiency of the irrigation project: Provided further, That the Secretary of the Interior is authorized, in his discretion, to make such a lease in connection with the Rio Grande project in Texas and New Mexico for a period not exceeding 50 years, with the approval of the water users' association, or associations, under any such project organized in conformity with the rules and regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior in pursuance of section 6 of the reclamation act approved June 17, 1902."

With the following committee amendments:

In line 8, page 1, after the word "act," insert the words "of February 24, 1911."

On page 2, line 8, strike out the words "said act" and insert the words "reclamation law."

In line 10, after the word "Interior," insert "with the approval of the legally organized and acting water users' association, or associations, under any such project."

In line 13, after the word "preference," insert the words "to municipal purposes and."

In line 15, after the word "law," strike out the words "and to municipal purposes."

In line 21, strike out, after the word "project," the remainder of the section from line 21 on page 2 to line 4 on page 3.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendments.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. BORLAND: Page 2, line 21, after the word "project," insert "Provided further, That leases for three years or less shall not require the approval of the water users' association."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I wish the gentleman would explain this amendment. It has not been recommended by the department.

Mr. MONDELL. It is not objected to.

Mr. BORLAND. I will say to the gentleman from Wisconsin that this bill provides for long-term leases of 50 years, which, it is assumed, will begin when the projects are virtually completed; but, as the gentleman knows, there are a number of projects where the water power is sufficiently developed to be used for some purpose while the project is still in course of construction. As to those works that are still in course of construction, it occurs to me that the Secretary of the Interior ought to have a wide discretionary power to utilize and derive profit from that water power during those construction days, without any veto from the water users' association. When the water power is virtually completed, then the water users' association will agree upon a long-time lease.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. What were the terms of that amendment? When is it to be leased for three years?

Mr. BORLAND. The exact terms of the amendment are to except leases for three years or less from the requirement of the approval of the water users' association.

Mr. MONDELL. In fact, such leases can be made at any time by the Secretary of the Interior without consulting the water users' association, the theory being that frequently the Secretary finds he can make short-term leases of the surplus power, which can be made quickly, and so long as it does not run for any considerable period of time there is no reason why the water users' association should be called upon to approve such a brief lease.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Can he make this lease hereafter?

Mr. BORLAND. He could under the amendment. If not, these projects may not be completed. One part of it may have the water power fully developed and another part the water power only partially developed.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. If the Secretary of the Interior can make a three-year lease at any time, and it is left discretionary with him to do it, without the consent of the water users' association, may not some Secretary of the Interior keep leasing over and over the surplus power for three years at a time?

Mr. MONDELL. I do not know but that that could be done, but it does not occur to me that that is possible.

Mr. BORLAND. Let me answer the gentleman from Wisconsin. That would not be a very profitable way to dispose of the power. This bill is bottomed upon the theory that the long-time lease permits the lessee to adjust himself to the situation and arrange what he wants to use the power for. That is the most profitable way to use the power, and the man or company who knows he can get a 25-year lease will be willing to pay more than the man who can use it only for three years, and perhaps use only a small amount. If the Secretary wishes to use the surplus power most profitably, the whole theory of these gentlemen is that they must have a long lease, and that long lease, in order to safeguard it from the improper or arbitrary action of the Secretary of the Interior, is to be submitted to the water users' association. But the short-time lease, practically confined to construction days, if it is required to be approved by the water users' association, is an entirely different matter.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The gentleman says this is to be practically confined to the construction time. It is not actually confined, but he could make a three-year lease at any time?

Mr. BORLAND. It is practicable but it is not probable, because that is not a very advantageous way to dispose of power arising from a water-power project. In any event, after the project is completed, the water users would have control and the Secretary would not have jurisdiction.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Who is to determine when the projects are finished?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. The Secretary of the Interior determines that.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] has expired.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be again reported.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the amendment will again be reported.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the gentleman really understands what that amendment means? Does he not intend that this provision shall apply during the construction of the project, and not apply after it is completed? Under this provision he can lease for three years and then lease for three years more, and then lease for three years more, and absolutely defeat the purpose of the bill.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will permit me to answer the question that he just asked me——

Mr. RAKER. That is what I asked it for.

Mr. BORLAND. The gentleman from Wyoming has already answered the question. The construction days may not be technically completed at all. There is practically no difficulty in permitting these leases to be made by the Secretary of the Interior for three years.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. BORLAND. The only question is that that is not a very profitable way to dispose of power, and would not be resorted to except before the water users really came into control.

Mr. MONDELL. I think that all these differing views can be composed by a very slight change of the language:

Provided further, That leases for three years or less, during the construction of a project——

Mr. RAKER. That is the purpose that I rose for.

Mr. BORLAND. I shall not object to that amendment.

Mr. RAKER. That answers the whole question.

Mr. BORLAND. I do not think it adds a thing to it, but the gentleman may offer the amendment if he wants to.

Mr. MONDELL. I prefer to have the gentleman offer it.

Mr. BORLAND. I ask unanimous consent to amend by inserting the words "during the construction of a project" after the word "less."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment as modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 21, after the word "project," insert: "Provided further, That leases for three years, or during the construction of a project, shall not require the approval of the water users' association."

Mr. BORLAND. I do not think the Clerk read that correctly.

Mr. MANN. I understood the gentleman's amendment was to give the right for 3 years to lease by the Secretary. This might give the right for 50 years, for aught I know.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. SMITH of Idaho, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, September 5, 1916.

(Legislative day of Friday, September 1, 1916.)

The Senate reassembled at 10 o'clock a. m., on the expiration of the recess.

THE REVENUE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 16763) to increase the revenue, and for other purposes.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire suggests the absence of a quorum. Let the Secretary call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Culberson	Hardwick	Lane
Bryan	Cummins	Husting	Lea, Tenn.
Chamberlain	Dillingham	Johnson, S. Dak.	McCumber
Clapp	Fletcher	Jones	Martin, Va.
Clarke, Ark.	Gallinger	Kenyon	Martine, N. J.
Colt	Gronna	La Follette	Myers
Norris	Reed	Smith, Ga.	Taggart
Overman	Shafroth	Smith, Mich.	Thomas
Penrose	Sheppard	Smith, S. C.	Thompson
Phelan	Sherman	Smoot	Underwood
Pittman	Simmons	Sterling	Vardaman

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The second roll will be called.

The Secretary called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. LEE of Maryland, Mr. POMERENE, and Mr. WEEKS answered to their names when called.

Mr. BRADY and Mr. RANSDELL entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

Mr. GALLINGER. I desire to announce that the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] is detained from the Senate on account of illness.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Forty-nine Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask the Senator having the bill in charge if he will not allow me to offer an amendment at this time, as I am compelled to leave the Chamber to attend a conference?

Mr. SIMMONS. I will be very glad to yield to the Senator for that purpose. I would not like to violate the rule I have followed, but the Senator has to attend a conference committee, and I yield to him to offer the amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. The amendment proposes to amend section 3354 of the Revised Statutes. All it provides is that any unfermented and partially fermented liquors may be transferred from the vat to the brewery by a pipe line. The law now provides that fermented liquors may be so transferred, but near beer that is being manufactured now can not under the law be transferred from the vat to the bottling department by pipe line. By changing the law the process will be much cleaner, and the department recommends the change. I therefore offer the following amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the amendment.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add at the end of the bill the following additional section:

SEC. —. That section 3354 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, as amended by the act approved June 18, 1890, be, and is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 3354. Every person who withdraws any fermented liquor from any hogshead, barrel, keg, or other vessel upon which the proper stamp has not been affixed for the purpose of bottling the same, or who carries on or attempts to carry on the business of bottling fermented liquor in any brewery or other place in which fermented liquor is made, or upon any premises having communication with such brewery, or any warehouse, shall be liable to a fine of $500, and the property used in such bottling or business shall be liable to forfeiture: Provided, however, That this section shall not be construed to prevent the withdrawal and transfer of unfermented, partially fermented, or fermented liquors from any of the vats in any brewery by way of a pipe line or other conduit to another building or place for the sole purpose of bottling the same, such pipe line or conduit to be constructed and operated in such manner and with such cisterns, vats, tanks, valves, cocks, faucets, and gauges, or other utensils or apparatus, either on the premises of the brewery or the bottling house, and with such changes of or additions thereto, and such locks, seals, or other fastenings, and under such rules and regulations as shall be from time to time prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, and all locks and seals prescribed shall be provided by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue at the expense of the United States: Provided further, That the tax imposed in section 3339 of the Revised Statutes of the United States shall be paid on all fermented liquor removed from a brewery to a bottling house by means of a pipe or conduit, at the time of such removal, by the cancellation and defacement, by the collector of the district or his deputy, in the presence of the brewer of the number of stamps denoting the tax on the fermented liquor thus removed. The stamps thus canceled and defaced shall be disposed of and accounted for in the manner directed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury. And any violation of the rules and regulations hereafter prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, in pursuance of these provisions, shall be subject to the penalties above provided by this section. Every owner, agent, or superintendent of any brewery or bottling house who removes, or connives at the removal of, any fermented liquor through a pipe line or conduit, without payment of the tax thereon, or who attempts in any manner to defraud the revenue as above, shall forfeit all the liquors made by and for him, and all the vessels, utensils, and apparatus used in making the same."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. SIMMONS. The amendment covers a bill which has already passed the House. There was an omission, however, in the bill which passed the House. The Senator has included that in the amendment?

Mr. SMOOT. That is included in the amendment.

Mr. SIMMONS. This amendment was suggested to the committee. I transmitted it to the department to see if there were any administration or revenue objections to it, and under date of August 28 I have a letter from the Acting Secretary, Mr. Malburn, in which he says that the department has no objection to the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. PENROSE. I should like to ask the Senator from Utah or the Senator from North Carolina what is the purpose of the amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. I will state the purpose to the Senator. Under the section that is proposed to be amended fermented liquors can be transferred from the vat to the bottling department in a pipe line. The department has held that near beer is not a fermented liquor and can not be transferred by pipe line under the law. The amendment simply adds to the law so as to allow near beer, so called, or unfermented liquors to be transferred through pipe lines from the vat to the bottling works.

Mr. PENROSE. It strikes me very favorably.

Mr. SIMMONS. In connection with what I have stated I desire to have the letter from the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury printed in the RECORD.

The letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, August 28, 1916.

Hon. F. M. SIMMONS,
Chairman Committee on Finance, United States Senate.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of this date, inclosing a bill (H. R. 17601) introduced in the House by Representative BRITTEN, which you forward for a report by me as to its possible effect upon the revenue and also with reference to frauds.

In reply I have the honor to call attention to what was probably an oversight in drafting the bill in omitting all the latter part of section 3354 in the restatement of that section as proposed. The portion omitted reads as follows:

"Provided further, That the tax imposed in section 3339 of the Revised Statutes of the United States shall be paid on all fermented liquor removed from a brewery to a bottling house by means of a pipe or conduit at the time of such removal, by cancellation and defacement, by the collector of the district or his deputy in the presence of the brewer, of the number of stamps denoting the tax on the fermented liquor thus removed. The stamps thus canceled and defaced shall be disposed of and accounted for in the manner directed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury. And any violation of the rules and regulations hereafter prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, in pursuance of these provisions shall be subject to the penalties above provided by this section. Every owner agent, or superintendent of any brewery or bottling house who removes or connives at the removal of any fermented liquor through a pipe line or conduit without payment of the tax thereon, or who attempts in any manner to defraud the revenue as above, shall forfeit all the liquors made by and for him and all the vessels, utensils, and apparatus used in making the same."

The omission of this portion of the section might operate as a repeal of such portion, which I am sure was not the intent of the author of the bill.

The purpose and effect of the bill, assuming the omitted portion of section 3354 to be restored, is to extend to brewers the same pipe-line facility for the bottling of beverages containing less than half of 1 per cent of alcohol by volume, which are held to be nontaxable, as they now enjoy with respect to the fermented liquor manufactured on their premises. The extension of the privilege as to these beverages would not affect the revenue adversely, inasmuch as the same are not taxed, whether removed by pipe line or otherwise.

I am satisfied that regulations can be framed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, as provided for in the bill, which will fully protect the revenue from any attempts to fraudulently use the new facilities for the transmission of the taxable article without properly taxpaying the same.

It is true that under any regulations likely to be made some additional expense to the Government might be incurred, arising from the necessary cost of additional supervision. This, however, is a minor matter, and I do not believe it would overbalance the benefits to be derived from the standpoint not only of the brewer but from that of the Government and the public as well.

From an administrative point of view, I see no objection to the passage of the bill, always assuming, as above suggested, that the portion omitted after the last proviso to section 3354 be restored in the restatement of the section in the text of the bill.

Respectfully,
WM. P. MALBURN,
Acting Secretary.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President——

Mr. SIMMONS. I have not yielded the floor.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I ask the Senator from North Carolina if he will permit me just a moment.

Mr. SIMMONS. I will yield to the Senator if the purpose for which he rises will lead to no debate.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I can not think that it will lead to any debate.

Mr. SIMMONS. Very well.

SIR ROGER CASEMENT.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, on July 29, 1916, a resolution was passed by the Senate of the United States requesting the President to use his kindly offices with the Government of Great Britain to stay the execution of Sir Roger Casement. Mr. President, it is currently stated and generally believed that through some one's failure or carelessness this resolution, weak as it was, was not officially forwarded to the British Government until after this martyr to the cause of liberty had been placed in his coffin. If this be true, it is too shocking to contemplate.

Hence I offer this resolution of inquiry (S. Res. 264):

Resolved, That the State Department of the United States is hereby requested to convey to the Senate the exact date and hour that the Senate resolution regarding Sir Roger Casement's sentence of death was placed in the hands of the British authorities.

If delay or carelessness existed in the transmission of that resolution, I feel that the people of this country should know the fact and upon whom the blame belongs.

I press the adoption of this resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Unless there is objection, the resolution is agreed to.

Mr. SIMMONS. I suggest that the resolution go to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Carolina objects to the present consideration of the resolution.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let it go to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. SIMMONS. I will yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. PENROSE. Let the resolution go to the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The request of the Senator from New Jersey is for unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution. The Senator from North Carolina objects.

Mr. SIMMONS. I object, and move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made, and it goes over under the rule for a day. It can not even be referred.

THE REVENUE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 16763) to increase the revenue, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the amendment of the Senator from Utah.

The amendment was agreed to.

RESERVE OFFICERS' TRAINING CORPS.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, without intending to interfere with the consideration of the pending bill except for a moment, as I shall be obliged to be absent from the Chamber a portion of the day, I wish to ask unanimous consent to call up the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 169) interpreting section 50 of the act of June 3, 1916, for making further and more effectual provision for the national defense, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio asks unanimous consent to temporarily lay aside the pending bill, in order to take up Senate joint resolution 169. Is there objection?

Mr. PENROSE. Let the joint resolution be read subject to objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania asks that the joint resolution may be read before the request for unanimous consent is disposed of. The Secretary will read the joint resolution.

The Secretary read the joint resolution, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That in the interpretation and execution of section 50 of the act of Congress approved June 3, 1916, credit shall be given as for service in the senior division of the Reserve Officers' Training Corps to any member of that division for any period or periods of time during which such member has received or shall have received at an educational institution under the direction of an officer of the Army, detailed as professor of military science and tactics, a course of military training substantially equivalent to that prescribed by regulations under this section for the corresponding period or periods of training of the senior division, Reserve Officers' Training Corps.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. PENROSE. I should like to ask the Senator from Ohio whether this joint resolution is recommended by the War Department?

Mr. POMERENE. It is recommended by the War Department, and I shall be glad to make a very brief explanation of it to the Senate.

Mr. PENROSE. I am not objecting to the consideration of the joint resolution, but I should like to have the Senator's explanation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, under the recent Army reorganization act, section 50 of that act provided for the senior division of the reserve officers' training corps. There was also a junior division of the reserve officers' training corps provided for. It was intended by the act that, before a student could be admitted to the senior division, he should have two years' training under a course of study which would meet the approval of the War Department. Under a strict construction of section 50, it is said that this would only apply to students who shall receive two years' training from and after the date the act went into effect. If so construed, a young man who has heretofore had two years of military instruction would not be entitled to the commutations the law authorizes. It was clearly the intention of the War Department, as it was of both the Senate and the House of Representatives, as I believe, that if a student had two years' training, even prior to the date of the passage of that act, in a course of study that had met the approval of the department, then he would be admitted to the senior division and would be entitled to the commutations.

The purpose of this amendment is so to construe section 50 of the act as to give students who have heretofore received two years' training, or who may hereafter receive it, the privilege of these commutations. I am quite sure it was the intention of the Senate and of the House to grant that privilege to such students, provided they passed the necessary examinations on a course of study which met the approval of the War Department.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution is before the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, and open to amendment. If there be no amendment, the joint resolution will be reported to the Senate.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DISTRICT COURT IN MAINE.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, on behalf of the Senator from Maine [Mr. JOHNSON] I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House bill 15807, which simply provides for the holding of court in a certain district in Maine. There is no provision in the bill for the appointment of a judge or anything of that kind.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Carolina asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill named by him. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 15807) to provide for holding sessions of the United States district court in the district of Maine and for dividing said district into divisions, and providing for offices of the clerk and marshal of said district to be maintained in each of said divisions, and for the appointment of a field deputy marshal in the division in which the marshal does not reside; which had been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with amendments.

The first amendment was, in section 1, page 1, line 7, after the words "first Tuesday of," to strike out "June" and to insert "February"; in line 8, after the words "first Tuesday of," to strike out "December," and to insert "June"; in the same line, before the word "sessions," to strike out "two," and to insert "three"; on page 2, line 2, after the word "April," to strike out "and," and to insert "on"; and in the same line, after the word "September," to strike out "in the year A. D. 1916 only, a term of said court shall also be held at said city of Portland on the second Tuesday of December," and to insert "and on the second Tuesday in December"; so as to make the section read:

That hereafter, and until otherwise provided by law, two sessions of the United States district court for the district of Maine shall be held in each and every year in the city of Bangor, in said district, beginning, respectively, on the first Tuesday of February and the first Tuesday of June, and three sessions of said court shall be held in each and every year in the city of Portland, in said district, beginning, respectively, on the first Tuesday of April, on the third Tuesday of September, and on the second Tuesday in December.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 2, page 2, line 21, after the word "marshal," to insert:

And such field deputy, before he enters on the duties of his office, shall give bond before the judge of said district of like tenor, effect, and amount and of similar form and condition, with like sureties, and to be approved in like manner, as now or may hereafter be required by law of the marshal of said district.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 3, page 3, line 8, after the word "and," to strike out "Franklin," and to insert "Somerset," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 3. That for the purpose of holding terms of the United States district court the district of Maine as heretofore constituted shall be divided into two divisions, to be known, respectively, as the northern and southern divisions. The counties of Aroostook, Penobscot, Piscataquis, Washington, Hancock, Waldo, and Somerset shall be known as the northern division, the court for which shall be held in the said city of Bangor. The remaining counties in said State and district of Maine shall constitute the southern division, the court for which shall be held in the said city of Portland.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 5, to strike out section 8, as follows:

SEC. 8. That grand and petit jurors summoned for service at the term of said court to be held in said city of Bangor on the first Tuesday of December, A. D. 1916, may if in the opinion of the court or judge the public convenience so requires, be directed to serve also at the term of said court to be held in said city of Portland on the second Tuesday of December, A. D. 1916, as provided in section 1 of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

HEARINGS BY COMMITTEE ON FINANCE.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate resolution 244, which was submitted by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] on August 5, referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, and reported from that committee on August 12 by me, with an amendment. It proposes to grant the right to the Committee on Finance to employ a stenographer to take testimony before that committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I shall not object to the consideration of this resolution, but I shall object to anything further now being taken up from the calendar and considered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection to the present consideration of the resolution.

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution, which had been reported from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate on August 12, 1916, with an amendment on page 1, line 3, after the word "Congress," to strike out the words "to send for persons, books, and papers," so as to make the resolution read:

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance, or any subcommittee thereof, be, and hereby is, authorized, during the Sixty-fourth Congress, to administer oaths, and to employ a stenographer, at a cost not exceeding $1 per printed page, to report such hearings as may be had in connection with any subject which may be pending before said committee, the expenses thereof to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate, and that the committee, or any subcommittee thereof, may sit during the sessions or recesses of the Senate.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

THE REVENUE.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I now call for the regular order.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I wonder if the Senator from North Carolina would not yield to me to ask unanimous consent to call up order of business No. 324, being House bill 407.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from South Dakota asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the order of business named by him. Is there objection?

Mr. SIMMONS. I wish to ask the Senator a question about it. Does the Senator anticipate that it will lead to any discussion?

Mr. STERLING. I hardly think it will.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It is the stock-raising homestead bill, and undoubtedly will lead to discussion; so I object.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I am going to reserve the right to object if the bill leads to any discussion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator can not reserve the right to object. If he does not object now, he can not object at all. Is there objection?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes; I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is objection. The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] has called for the regular order.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 16763) to increase the revenue, and for other purposes.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the bill, and read Title VII, creating a tariff commission.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, under the rule of procedure which we have adopted in connection with this bill that committee amendments should have precedence, I do not know whether it is in order to make the motion at this time which I desire to make. I desire to move to strike out the sections relating to the tariff commission, and I desire to ask the Chair whether that is in order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Certain amendments have been proposed by the committee. The rule is that where a motion is made to strike out a proposition the friends of the proposition have the right to perfect it before the motion to strike out is submitted. A motion to strike out can not be put until all pending amendments to perfect the provision have been presented and disposed of.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. At this time, are there committee amendments pending?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Three committee amendments appear to have been presented, one in line 12 and two in line 13, on page 142.

Mr. GALLINGER. Has the entire provision been read?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The tariff-commission provision has been read. Is that the provision to which the Senator from Alabama directs his inquiry?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thought the Senator referred to the provision on page 142, which the Secretary was just beginning to read.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I desire to move to strike out the provisions the Secretary has just read relating to a tariff commission.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will inform the Senator that the meaning of the rule is that no individual amendments can be entertained until the committee amendments have been disposed of, and there are still other committee amendments to be considered. After they are acted upon the Chair will be glad to recognize the Senator for the purpose indicated.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, does that mean the committee amendments to the entire bill or committee amendments to the several parts or titles of the bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Amendments may be offered at the proper time to any part of the bill a Senator may think needs amendment. There is no limitation upon the right of an individual Senator to offer amendments.

Mr. STERLING. I inquire if it would be in order to offer an amendment to the tariff-commission provision of the bill at this time?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Not at this time, as the committee amendments to the bill have not all been disposed of. The Senator from Alabama has just indicated that he desires to make a motion to strike out the entire provision relating to a tariff commission, but before that motion is put amendments looking to the perfection of the provision will be in order. At present, however, there remain committee amendments to be considered. The Secretary will proceed with the reading.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Finance was, on page 142, line 7, in the headline after the word "Title," to strike out "VII" and insert "VIII," so as to read:

Title VIII.—Unfair competition.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 142, in line 12, after the name "United States," to strike out "to," in the same line, after the word "systematically," to insert "to import"; and in line 13, before the word "sold," to insert "imported or," so as to make the clause read:

SEC. 99. That it shall be unlawful for any person importing or assisting in importing any articles from any foreign country into the United States, commonly and systematically to import, sell, or cause to be imported or sold such articles within the United States at a price substantially less than the actual market value or wholesale price of such articles, at the time of exportation to the United States, in the principal markets of the country of their production, or of other foreign countries to which they are commonly exported, after adding to such market value or wholesale price, freight, duty, and other charges and expenses necessarily incident to the importation and sale thereof in the United States: Provided, That such act or acts be done with the intent of destroying or injuring an industry in the United States, or of preventing the establishment of an industry in the United States, or of restraining or monopolizing any part of trade and commerce in such articles in the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 143, line 24, after the word "duty," to insert: "Provided, That the above shall not be interpreted to prevent the establishing in this country on the part of a foreign producer of an exclusive agency for the sale in the United States of the products of said foreign producer." So as to make the clause read:

SEC. 100. That if any article produced in a foreign country is imported into the United States under any agreement, understanding, or condition that the importer thereof or any other person in the United States shall not use, purchase, or deal in, or shall be restricted in his using, purchasing, or dealing in, the articles of any other person, there shall be levied, collected, and paid thereon, in addition to the duty otherwise imposed by law, a special duty equal to double the amount of such duty: Provied, That the above shall not be interpreted to prevent the establishing in this country on the part of a foreign producer of an exclusive agency for the sale in the United States of the products of said foreign producer.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, in section 100 the committee report an amendment to the House provision, as follows:

Provided, That the above shall not be interpreted to prevent the establishing in this country on the part of a foreign producer of an exclusive agency for the sale in the United States of the products of said foreign producer.

I believe that that amendment is a proper one; but I believe we ought to go further than the amendment of the committee, by adding to that amendment these words:

Nor to prevent such exclusive agent from agreeing not to use, purchase, or deal in the articles of any other person.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. THOMAS. The amendment presented by the committee was prepared with a good deal of care by an attorney who represented certain importers in the city of New York, and the purpose designed to be covered by it was so obvious that it was accepted by the committee. Afterwards the amendment just suggested by the Senator from Utah was brought to the committee's attention, and after due consideration it was rejected, because we feared it might be the basis of a practice—that, however, was an apprehension rather than a certainty—which would result in defeating the proviso altogether. We therefore concluded that it was better to reject it.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator from Colorado that I fully agree with the amendment that has been agreed to by the committee and that has just been reported to the Senate; but if we go that far, it seems to me we ought to go a step farther and provide:

Nor to prevent such exclusive agent from agreeing not to use, purchase, or deal in the articles of any other person.

In other words, Mr. President, an exclusive agency in this country for a foreign article should not prevent that person from acting as an agent for an entirely different line of goods, and it seems to me that he is restricted under the language of the committee. If he is dealing in any article of a foreign manufacturer, unless the provision as suggested by me is adopted, I can not see how he can become the agent of any other person or firm; and I do not think we want to go that far in this bill.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I believe that this amendment, as it appears in the bill, would not preclude an agent appointed under it from doing what is intended to be permitted by the suggested amendment of the Senator from Utah. On the other hand, I do not think it is prudent to invest the exclusive agent of a foreign firm with authority to become also the exclusive agent of other foreign firms, either in the same line or some other line of business.

Mr. SMOOT. But I can not see why that should not be done; and I believe if this amendment is not adopted no person in the United States can act as an exclusive agent for two foreign firms that may make entirely different goods.

Mr. THOMAS. If that is the objection of the Senator, I do not think it applies at all. The exclusive agent of one line of goods certainly would not be precluded from becoming the exclusive agent for another line of goods that were entirely different from the first.

Mr. SMOOT. This is what the section provides:

That if any article produced in a foreign country is imported into the United States under any agreement, understanding, or condition that the importer thereof or any other person in the United States shall not use, purchase, or deal in, or shall be restricted in his using, purchasing, or dealing in, the articles of any other person, there shall be levied, collected, and paid thereon, in addition to the duty otherwise imposed by law, a special duty equal to double the amount of such duty.

Mr. THOMAS. Yes; and then we make an exception with regard to exclusive agencies for foreign goods.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; certainly you do, in relation to foreign goods; but my amendment goes further, and says:

Nor to prevent such exclusive agent—

That is, of foreign goods—from agreeing not to use, purchase, or deal in the articles of any other person—

Whether it be in the United States or whether it be in a foreign country. I do not believe the Senator will undertake to defend the position that if a person is an exclusive agent for a foreign manufacturer he can not also make an agreement to sell here goods made by any other person.

Mr. THOMAS. Oh, I do not defend any part of it. This whole section is repulsive to my notions of what we ought to do, Mr. President.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. CUMMINS. The exception is not quite as broad as indicated by the Senator from Utah, and I fear that it will not have the effect that the committee has in mind. It will be observed that it is limited to a foreign producer; that is, a foreign merchant can not establish an exclusive agency.

Mr. THOMAS. If the Senator will permit me to call the attention of the chairman to the phraseology of the proviso, I agent of other foreign firms, either in the same line or in some different or better expression than the word "producer" the committee will be glad to accept it. With regard to the suggested amendment of the Senator from Utah, if the chairman does not object, I am perfectly willing to accept it and let it go to conference, where the matter can be adjusted.

Mr. CUMMINS. The thought in my mind, and I want to ask the Senator from Colorado——

Mr. SIMMONS. Will the Senator let us finish this amendment before we go on to that one? The Senator from Utah has offered an amendment, as I understand.

Mr. CUMMINS. What I was about to say has to do with the amendment.

Mr. SIMMONS. Well, then, let me simplify it by saying that I think the suggestion of the Senator from Colorado is a very good one. Let it go in the bill, and in conference we can consider it.

Mr. SMOOT. That will be satisfactory to me, as far as my amendment is concerned.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. What is the proposition of the chairman of the committee?

Mr. SIMMONS. What I said, Mr. President, was that I thought the suggestion made by the Senator from Colorado, who has charge of this part of the bill, was a very good one, and that I saw no objection to allowing the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah to go into the bill, with the understanding that the matter would be taken up in conference.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Unless there is objection, that course will be adopted. The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The Senator from Utah has not yet sent his amendment to the desk.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Chair that I will write out the amendment and hand it to the Secretary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment was, on page 144, after line 6, to insert:

SEC. 102. That whenever any country, dependency, or colony shall prohibit the importation of any article the product of the soil or industry of the United States and not injurious to health or morals, the President, within his discretion, shall have power to prohibit, during the period such prohibition is in force the importation into the United States of similar articles, or in case the United States does not import similar articles from that country, then other articles, the products of such country, dependency, or colony.

And the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approval of the President, shall make such rules and regulations as are necessary for the execution of the provisions of this section.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 144, after line 18, to insert:

TITLE IX.

SEC. 103. That from and after 90 days after the passage of this act no fresh or frozen halibut or salmon from the north Pacific Ocean or its tributary waters shall be admitted into the United States through any foreign country, except when the same shall be in bond from an American port.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I do not intend to address the Senate on this particular provision. It was proposed as an amendment to the bill by me, referred to the Finance Committee for consideration, and reported back as a part of the bill now being considered.

Through the courtesy of Hon. CLAUDE KITCHIN I have been furnished two letters bearing upon the subject and giving a complete history of the necessities which have made the provision necessary in order to protect a great and growing industry off the banks of Alaska and American vessels and seamen engaged in this industry. One of these letters was addressed by the Secretary of Commerce to the President of the United States, and the other was addressed by the Commissioner of Fisheries to the Secretary of Commerce, both dealing with the conditions to which this amendment refers and the interests which it is intended to protect.

These communications were referred to Mr. KITCHIN by the President and deal so completely with the subject that I request that they may be printed in the RECORD as a part of the history of the provision under consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The request of the Senator from Oregon will be complied with unless there is objection. The Chair hears none.

The matter referred to is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, May 6, 1916.

MY DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: I beg respectfully to inclose original report of the Commissioner of Fisheries to me on the conditions which threaten serious economic loss, if not disaster, to the important town of Ketchikan in southeastern Alaska. A copy of this has been submitted to the Department of State who advise under date of May 1 as follows:

"As you probably already know, there is no legal objection to the proposed legislation There is a question of policy involved, and as to that it would seem that the Treasury Department had better be consulted. As far as this department is concerned, I can see no objection to the proposed legislation."

The above is signed by Mr. Lansing. Pursuant to the above suggestion the matter was submitted to the Treasury Department, who under date of May 4 advise as follows:

"I have received your letter of May 3 inclosing a memorandum from the Commissioner of Fisheries to you, dated March 30, 1916, in regard to the effect of the order in council of the Canadian Government of March 9, 1915, relaxing restrictions previously in effect in respect to the landing of and transshipping of fresh fish by American vessels at Canadian-Pacific coast ports on the industries of Ketchikan and other towns in the United States, and asking if the enactment of a proposed law as follows would be objectionable from the viewpoint of this department:

"'No fresh or frozen halibut or salmon from the North Pacific Ocean or its tributary waters shall be admitted into the United States through any foreign country except when the same is in bond from an American port.'

"This is a matter which does not affect the revenues of the Government and I can see nothing objectionable in the proposed legislation."

I beg respectfully to ask that the report of the Commissioner of Fisheries with copy of this letter which is sent for that purpose in duplicate, may be transmitted to the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives for incorporation, if possible, in the proposed revenue bill. If, however, this matter should in your judgment be treated otherwise, I shall be glad to be advised and will follow your wishes.

Let me add to what the Commissioner of Fisheries has stated that the subject has been discussed between the counselor for the State Department, Mr. Frank L. Polk, the British ambassador, and myself, and I have also taken it up briefly with the deputy minister of fisheries of the Canadian Government at a recent call upon me.

Mr. H. C. Strong, of Ketchikan, advises me that the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway has informed him that they would take steps to put Ketchikan on a satisfactory basis as regards Prince Rupert if and when they were forced to do so. This would mean running a ferry steamer three times a week at present for the 90 miles from Ketchikan to Prince Rupert. They are not now doing so, however, with the result that by reason of the specially tempting privileges extended to fishermen at Prince Rupert the commercial existence of the port of Ketchikan is seriously threatened. I have tried to make clear through the British ambassador the unwisdom on the part of the railroad authorities of antagonizing our Alaskan interests, to whom they must inevitably look in the future for a considerable part of their business, but they show no sign of action.

Yours, very truly,

WILLIAM C. REDFIELD, Secretary.

THE PRESIDENT,
The White House.

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, March 30, 1916.

THE SECRETARY OF COMMERCE:

In compliance with the instructions in your letter of the 15th instant to prepare a report, for consideration, if necessary, by committees of Congress, upon the halibut fishery of the Pacific coast, particularly in respect to conditions which have developed within the last year or two in the way of diverting the industry from American ports to Prince Rupert, British Columbia, it seems not inappropriate to review briefly a few of the more important historical facts and submit a statement of the methods pursued in regard to the halibut fishery of the Pacific coast.

From the records it appears that beginning about 1888 there was some desultory halibut fishing, chiefly on banks which were beginning to become known in the vicinity of Cape Flattery, on the northern coast of Washington, and extending from there northward, most of the fish being landed at Seattle and Tacoma. It was not until 1894 that the industry assumed any noteworthy commercial importance. From that time until the present its growth has been such that now approximately 95 per cent of the halibut consumed in the United States comes from the Pacific coast, where the catch amounts to more than 65,000,000 pounds a year. Only a small part of the output has come from waters south of Cape Flattery, although in recent years increased attention has been given to grounds lying off the Oregon and Washington coast, and considerable quantities of fish have there been taken. The more important banks, however, are to the northward, and now the larger proportion of the entire catch is from the banks off the coast of Alaska. It is the Alaskan banks to which attention is now chiefly directed, for it is believed that upon these banks there exists the greatest supply of halibut known to the world.

METHODS.

In describing briefly the methods pursued in the Pacific halibut fishery, it may be noted that halibut are caught on hooks attached to long lines or trawls and baited with herring. The lines are set from dories operated from steamers or power schooners of commodious and seaworthy capacity, so as to enable the vessels to weather gales while out on the fishing banks. There are now upward of 150 American vessels thus engaged. Halibut fishing is generally conducted in water of from 40 to 100 fathoms in depth, although halibut are sometimes taken at a depth of 250 fathoms. The steamers are generally equipped with 12 to 14 dories, while the power schooners as a rule carry from 4 to 8 dories. Each dory is manned by two fishermen. The fishermen on steam vessels usually receive 1½ cents a pound for the halibut caught, clear of all expense of operation, board, etc. As a rule, in schooner operations the vessel takes one-fifth of the gross catch, while from the remaining four-fifths there is deducted all cost for fuel, stores, supplies, and other items, and the remainder is then divided equally among the crew. Sometimes the captain receives in addition a small commission.

A modification of dory fishing has been adopted recently to a rather limited degree. It consists of setting the trawl lines directly from the deck of the vessel and hauling them in by means of a power winch. This enables vessels to operate when the weather is too stormy to permit of dory fishing.

CENTERS OF INDUSTRY.

The halibut industry of the Pacific Coast has always centered at Seattle, Wash. The greater portion of the catch has been brought to Seattle by the fishing fleet, but there have been approximately 14,000,000 pounds per annum discharged at Alaska ports, and there iced, boxed, and shipped to dealers in Seattle; but the unsatisfactory steamer service and the disadvantages arising from the inability of the fishermen to deal in person with the buyers have made this practice unpopular. The price in the year 1915 has varied from about 12½ cents per pound in winter to 2½ cents per pound in the late spring, when the catches have been heaviest, the average for the year being about 5½ cents a pound. This is the price received by the independent fishermen for halibut as delivered at the docks in Seattle, and is for first-grade fish in good condition. The average weight of the best grade of halibut is about 30 pounds per fish. The so-called chicken halibut, those running usually about 10 to 15 pounds in weight, and the larger halibut, weighing from 50 to 100 pounds or more, are not regarded with as much favor as those averaging about 30 pounds.

The cold-storage plants at Juneau, Sitka, Wrangell, and Ketchikan receive some fish throughout most of the year, but it is chiefly when halibut are plentiful that most of the freezing is done. The largest of these plants is that of the New England Fish Company at Ketchikan. This establishment was completed in 1909 and was enlarged three years later, so that at present it has a storage capacity of approximately 4,000,000 pounds of frozen halibut and represents an investment of about $300,000. The other plants referred to are smaller and depend upon independent fishermen for receipts of halibut, whereas the New England Fish Company operates vessels on its own account.

At Seattle and Tacoma there are five cold-storage establishments where halibut are handled, and in addition there are several buyers who receive the fish as landed by the fishing vessels. At certain seasons of the year the fish are frozen and stored, but at other times they are iced for immediate shipment, the chief distributing centers being Boston and New York. In the winter months when the arrivals of fresh fish are comparatively limited—so small in fact at times that it is only the local demand or requirements of the western States that can be supplied—the shipments of frozen halibut are made to the eastern markets.

For many years halibut have been landed at Tacoma, Wash., though in nothing like the quantity landed at Seattle, and also in a less degree at Grays Harbor and Everett, Wash., and Stevenson, Hayesport, and Vancouver, British Columbia.

The foregoing is an outline of the halibut fishery of the Pacific coast as it existed up to a year or two ago, when Prince Rupert, British Columbia, came to the fore and now bids fair to become the chief center of the industry, unless early steps of a definite character are taken to retain it in American ports.

ENTRY OF PRINCE RUPERT AS HALIBUT CENTER.

It is understood that dominant Canadian interests for a number of years had been carrying out a logically conceived policy to make Prince Rupert one of the chief fishery centers of the Pacific coast. This carefully arranged plan had its culmination in the completion of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway, followed by the order in council of March 9, 1915. It is reported that the Canadian Government subsidized the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway and in addition gave a subsidy for the construction of a fish-freezing establishment at Prince Rupert, which is said to be the largest of its kind on the Pacific coast.

With the completion of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway through to Prince Rupert, British Columbia, the halibut situation became acute. Since that time an active campaign has been waged between the American cities on the one hand and Prince Rupert and, to a less degree, Vancouver on the other hand for control of the industry. The seriousness of the situation as seen from the American point of view may be recognized from the fact that during the year 1914 American fishing vessels landed no fish at Prince Rupert, but from March, 1915, to the end of the year American vessels landed more than 7,000,000 pounds of halibut at that port and Canadian vessels 8,000,000 pounds. It is reported that 80 per cent of the Canadian-caught fish were shipped to American markets.

This active entry of Prince Rupert into the field for the trade in American as well as Canadian-caught halibut was made possible through a Dominion order in council on March 9, 1915, relaxing restrictions previously in effect in respect to the landing and transshipping of fresh fish by American vessels at Canadian Pacific coast ports. This order was as follows:

"During the present calendar year (1915) foreigners or foreign corporations bringing fresh fish in vessels registered in the United States of America to any port in British Columbia shall be permitted to land such fresh fish at such port without payment of duties and transship the same in bond to any port in the United States, or to sell such fish in bond to such local dealers or dealer as may be properly and duly licensed therefor, under the regulations and conditions in compliance with the bonding requirements (without the right, however, in either instance, to sell in Canada for consumption therein, or otherwise except in bond, any of such fresh fish so landed); and such foreigners and foreign corporations bringing fresh fish in vessels registered in the United States of America to any port in British Columbia, shall be permitted to purchase supplies, and ship crews for such vessels, at any port in the said Province of British Columbia, the whole under such regulations and conditions as the minister of customs may determine."

The chief feature of this order is that it altered Canadian regulations to such an extent as to make it possible for Canada to receive the benefits of the American fishing industry, and yet it does not benefit American trade, as the fish so landed by American vessels are prohibited from going into consumption in Canada.

Although Seattle has felt to a certain extent the new order of things, it has nevertheless, by reason of being the headquarters of the large fishing firms owning their own steamers, held a considerable volume during the year 1915; but three of these companies have announced that they will find it necessary to establish themselves at Prince Rupert in 1916 unless conditions change.

So far, Ketchikan has suffered most. Prior to the promulgation of the order in council, hereinabove cited, Ketchikan enjoyed a profitable halibut fishery. In fact, it was regarded as the center of the industry in Alaska. At certain seasons of the year many cargoes of halibut were landed at Ketchikan, and there was the incidental industrial activity due to the purchase of supplies and the outfitting of the vessels as well as paying off crews. It is reported that soon after the Canadian order in council became effective the American fishermen almost entirely discontinued the landing of cargoes at Ketchikan for shipment to Seattle, finding it advantageous to accept the inducements offered at Prince Rupert where they were able to meet and do business directly with buyers for the American markets. Thus the Canadian port became their headquarters.

The present hold of Prince Rupert, by reason of its more direct transportation facilities to the halibut markets of the East and because of privileges and inducements offered to American fishermen through the order in council of March 9, 1915, is so firmly established that American fishermen and American companies handling fresh halibut have literally been forced to transfer their chief activities to Prince Rupert. American fishermen are taking up their residence there, and the United States is thus suffering the loss of a class of citizens who have done considerable toward the development of Alaska, particularly southeastern Alaska. At the same time there is the attendant loss which other lines of industry suffer as the result of the removal of these fishermen and their families to Prince Rupert.

INVESTMENT IN THE HALIBUT FISHERY.

Exact figures as to the investment in the halibut fishery of the Pacific coast are not available. Upon the basis of very careful estimates, however, the total investment in the American halibut fishery on the Pacific coast may be stated as approximately $3,500,000, which sum includes the packing and refrigerating plants valued in excess of $1,500,000, and a fishing fleet of approximately 150 vessels worth about $2,000,000. These vessels include both large and small, varying in value from $5,000 to $100,000 each. Approximately 2,000 persons are engaged and the value to the fishermen of the American-caught fish in 1915 is estimated to be $2,500,000. The estimated investment in the Canadian halibut fishery is $1,000,000, and it gives employment to about 500 persons, the value of the product to Canadian fishermen being about $750,000. At the present time the Canadian fleet numbers about 30 vessels. Combining these estimated figures covering the American and Canadian halibut fishery, there is a total investment of $4,500,000, employment is given to 2,500 persons, and the annual value of the product to the fishermen is $3,250,000. The retail value is four times this amount.

COMPARISON OF HALIBUT CATCH OF 1914 AND 1915.

The total catch of halibut from Pacific waters landed at both American and Canadian ports was approximately 64,000,000 pounds in 1914 and 66,000,000 pounds in 1915. Less than one-fourth of these catches was made by Canadian vessels. Of the 1914 catch arrivals in British Columbia ports amounted to about 17,000,000 pounds, but in 1915 when the total production of all Pacific waters was only a little larger than the previous year the arrivals of halibut in British Columbia increased to nearly 28,000,000 pounds, an increase in receipts for British Columbia in 1915 of 11,000,000 pounds. This increase represents halibut landed by American vessels as a result of concessions made by the Canadian Government to draw the American fleet to its ports. As was obviously intended by Canada, Prince Rupert has been the chief beneficiary, for it was at that port that American fishing vessels landed more than 7,000,000 pounds of halibut in 1915 as against nothing in 1914. Vancouver also shows a notable gain in 1915, when American vessels landed about 4,000,000 pounds. These gains in trade for Canada have been at the direct expense of American ports, chiefly Ketchikan and Seattle.

FROZEN SALMON.

There is also a trade in frozen salmon that is passing from southeastern Alaska to Prince Rupert that demands consideration in order that it may be continued as an American industry. At present it is small as compared to the halibut trade, but it may be developed considerably. It is estimated that it produces a quarter of a million pounds of frozen salmon annually, valued at $25,000, and gives partial employment for two or three months in the year to about 1,000 persons, whose catch, however, is chiefly used for mild curing. Most of the salmon frozen are caught in waters contiguous to the Alaskan coast, and the trade rightfully belongs to Alaska.

GENERAL RATHER THAN LOCAL INJURY TO AMERICAN INTERESTS.

The opening of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway to Prince Rupert, which prompted the order in council of March 9, 1915, has in reality been the all-important cause back of this loss of American trade, and as its effect is felt both at Ketchikan and Seattle as well as other less important American ports, the injury may with propriety be regarded as of a general character rather than of a local nature. It is not only the American fishing industry which is harmed, but there are extensive collateral interests represented by firms engaged in outfitting and supplying the fishing fleets with ice, bait, foodstuffs, fishing gear, and distillate, the trade in which is lost to the United States when vessels land their catch at Canadian ports. It is estimated that the loss of such collateral trade to America in 1915 amounted to $500,000. Unless conditions are changed speedily, this diversion will increase rapidly. Already one large Seattle firm, whose chief business has been the outfitting of halibut vessels, has been forced to establish a branch at Prince Rupert. Two large American corporations operating cold-storage plants at Seattle have recently stated in communications that the Bureau of Fisheries has seen that unless prompt action is taken to relieve the existing condition it will be necessary for them to build plants and make other heavy investments at Prince Rupert. These companies have clearly indicated that they do not care to enter this field, preferring to make their northern investments in Alaska, but that they will be forced to do so in order to retain their share of the business unless the situation changes.

Another serious phase of the situation is the fact that America is losing a valuable citizenry in those who will move to Canada and in the course of a few years will be assimilated completely by that country. Thus the diversion of Pacific halibut trade through Canadian ports means not only a pecuniary loss to American interests, but also the loss of good citizens and their families, who will eventually become alienated from the United States. There may be stout denials of this alienation, but the insidious workings of time and environment will unquestionably produce this result.

SUGGESTED REMEDIES.

Various suggestions more or less important have been made to improve conditions affecting the Pacific coast halibut fishery, but at the present time and after full and careful consideration of the problem it is believed that the enactment of the following measure offers the best solution:

"No fresh or frozen halibut or salmon from the North Pacific Ocean or its tributary waters shall be admitted into the United States through any foreign country except when the same is in bond from an American port."

This measure seems simple in its terms and easy of application, and its adoption is believed to be an efficient means of reserving the halibut fishery to American cities on the Pacific coast and at the same time will not admit readily of retaliatory masures or acts of reprisal by the Canadian authorities. Its effect on the fishermen will simply be that the fish they now land at Canadian ports will be landed chiefly at Ketchikan, where they will have market facilities equaling those now at Prince Rupert, and they will save the 90-mile trip to the Canadian port. It will necessitate the inauguration by the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway of a ferry service suitable for the transportation of fish from Ketchikan, where the shipments would be accepted in bond for our eastern markets. The Grand Trunk Pacific Railway will, if the measure hereinabove suggested is adopted, undoubtedly grant such facilities, as it needs the business of southeast Alaska. Prince Rupert is bound to benefit by the shipment of halibut even though originally landed at Ketchikan, but over and above this the fact stands forth plainly that the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway undoubtedly needs this business as halibut is the road's most profitable factor in the eastbound freight.

It is not deemed expedient that the United States Government should adopt measures which will mean that fresh Alaskan halibut can not or will not be shipped to Eastern markets over the Canadian railroads, but it is believed that such fish should go in bond from an American port. The Grand Trunk Pacific Railway is undoubtedly a shorter line to the east, probably saving at least 48 hours between Alaska and the chief distributing centers for halibut, Boston and New York. Any means which will permit of more prompt delivery of a perishable food product is of advantage to the consumer. This situation, however, only slightly affects halibut shipped to Seattle; and, as a matter of fact, according to the present schedule halibut can be laid down in Chicago more quickly from Seattle than from Prince Rupert, but shipments to Boston and New York can be made from Alaska more quickly through Prince Rupert than by way of steamer to Seattle and thence over an American railroad.

Under present regulations American fishing vessels are barred from discharging fish at Canadian ports for consumption in Canada, but Canadian vessels have the privilege of selling their catch in the United States in addition to selling in Canada. In other words, Canada discriminates against American vessels, but the United States does not place similar restrictions upon the sale of fish caught by Canadian vessels. This means that Americans are forced to add vessels of Canadian registry to their fleets if they want to participate in the Canadian trade, and without effective legislation the tendency will be to increase the Canadian fleet at American expense.

The American shipping laws require that if a foreign fishing vessel enters a port in the United States and discharges its cargo it can not clear for the fishing banks and return with its catch to an American port. Instead the vessel after landing its catch must clear for its home port. After entering there it may proceed to the fishing banks and again land its cargo at an American port. The measure herein suggested, that no fresh or frozen fish from the North Pacific shall be admitted into the United States through any foreign country except when the same is in bond from an American port, would not work a hardship upon Canadian vessels as, after discharging their catch, they can easily enter a Canadian port before returning to the fishing grounds.

So far as this office is aware no practicable plan has yet been suggested whereby the bureau, the town of Ketchikan, or the Territory of Alaska, can take any action that will be helpful. The only solution seems to be congressional action, and the best remedy that has yet been developed for consideration by Congress is the passage of a law worded as hereinabove suggested. It is not thought that this measure is open to international complications, the only possibility along this line being an attempt on the part of Canada to modify the present reciprocal relations in respect to the bonding of goods in transit through the respective countries, which is not at all probable. Such an act on the part of Canada would not only deprive her railroads of revenue, but equally inconvenience her own people.

H. M. SMITH,
Commissioner.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment was, on page 145, line 1, in the headline, to strike out "VIII" and insert "X," so as to read:

Title X.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 145, after line 9, to strike out:

SEC. 701. That unless otherwise herein specially provided, this act shall take effect on the day following its passage, and all provisions of any act or acts inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was concluded.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, the committee offers the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Colorado, on behalf of the Finance Committee, proposes an amendment which will be stated by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. On page 144, at the end of line 18, following the amendment heretofore agreed to——

Mr. THOMAS. I think the words "at the end of line 18" should be excluded, because an amendment has been adopted—the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES]—which is inserted after the end of line 18. This amendment will succeed the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky.

The SECRETARY. Following an amendment heretofore agreed to, it is proposed to insert a new section to read as follows:

SEC. —. That whenever, during the existence of a war in which the United States is not engaged, the President shall be satisfied that there is reasonable ground to believe that any vessel, American or foreign, is, on account of the laws, regulations, or practices of a belligerent Government, making or giving any undue or unreasonable preference or advantage in any respect whatsoever to any particular person, company, firm, or corporation, or any particular description of traffic in the United States or its possessions or to any citizens of the United States residing in neutral countries abroad, or is subjecting any particular person, company, firm, or corporation or any particular description of traffic in the United States or its possessions, or any citizens of the United States residing in neutral countries abroad to any undue or unreasonable prejudice, disadvantage, injury, or discrimination in regard to accepting, receiving, transporting, or delivering, or refusing to accept, receive, transfer, or deliver any cargo, freight, or passengers, or in any other respect whatsoever, he is hereby authorized and empowered, in his discretion, to direct the detention of such vessels by withholding clearance or by formal notice forbidding departure and to revoke, modify, or renew any such direction as in his opinion the public interest may require.

That whenever, during the existence of a war in which the United States is not engaged, the President shall be satisfied that there is reasonable ground to believe that under the laws, regulations, or practices of any belligerent country or Government American ships or American citizens are not accorded any of the facilities of commerce which the vessels or citizens of that belligerent country enjoy in the United States or its possessions, or are not accorded by such belligerent equal privileges or facilities of trade with vessels or citizens of any nationality other than that of such belligerent, the President is hereby authorized and empowered, in his discretion, to withhold clearance from one or more vessels of such belligerent country until such belligerent shall restore to such American vessels and American citizens reciprocal liberty of commerce and equal facilities of trade; or the President may, in his discretion, direct that similar privileges and facilities, if any, enjoyed by vessels or citizens of such belligerent in the United States or its possessions be refused to vessels or citizens of such belligerent; and in such case he shall make proclamation of his direction, stating the facilities and privileges which shall be refused, and the belligerent to whose vessels or citizens they are to be refused, and thereafter the furnishing of such prohibited privileges and facilities to any vessel or citizen of the belligerent named in such proclamation shall be unlawful; and he may change, modify, revoke, or renew such proclamation as in his opinion the public good may require; and any person or persons who shall furnish or attempt or conspire to furnish or be concerned in furnishing or in the concealment of furnishing facilities or privileges to ships or persons contrary to the prohibition in such proclamation shall be liable to a fine of not less than $2,000 nor more than $50,000 or to imprisonment not to exceed two years, or both, in the discretion of the court.

In case any vessel which is detained by virtue of this act shall depart or attempt to depart from the jurisdiction of the United States without clearance or other lawful authority, the owner or master or person or persons having charge or command of such vessel shall be severally liable to a fine of not less than $2,000 nor more than $10,000, or to imprisonment not to exceed two years, or both, and in addition such vessel shall be forfeited to the United States.

That the President of the United States is hereby authorized and empowered to employ such part of the land or naval forces of the United States as shall be necessary to carry out the purposes of this act.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, I desire to submit an amendment at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will announce that if no further committee amendments are to be presented the amendment offered by the Senator from California will be stated.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I wish to offer certain additional amendments.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from California presents an amendment, which the Secretary will read.

Mr. SIMMONS. Why, Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair does not know what it is until it is read. Then it will appear whether it is a committee amendment or not.

Mr. PHELAN. It is not a committee amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Then it is not in order. The Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, on page 34 of the bill, at the end of line 11, under the exemptions in reference to securities of farm and Federal land banks, and so forth, I desire to offer a new paragraph in these words:

Joint-stock land banks as to income derived from bonds or debentures of other joint-stock land banks or any Federal land bank belonging to such joint-stock land bank.

That is an amendment suggested by the Secretary of the Treasury.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will send the amendment to the desk and it will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 34, paragraph "thirteenth," proposed by the committee, was passed over at the instance of the Senator from Utah. After that paragraph which has been passed over it is proposed to insert:

Fourteenth. Joint-stock land banks as to income derived from bonds or debentures of other joint-stock land banks or any Federal land bank belonging to such joint-stock land bank.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Unless there is objection, the amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina on behalf of the Finance Committee will be agreed to. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

Mr. SIMMONS. On page 8 line 10, after the word "possessions," I move to add "or securities issued under the provisions of the Federal farm-loan act of July 17, 1916."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SIMMONS. On page 49, line 16, after the word "title," I move to insert the words "and the acts of August 5, 1909, and October 3, 1913."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the vote by which the amendment of the committee at that place was agreed to will be reconsidered. The Senator from North Carolina offered an amendment to the amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In the amendment on page 49, line 15, after the word "title," insert "and the acts of August 5, 1909, and October 3, 1913."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary informs the Chair that one of the committee amendments was passed over without being disposed of. It will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 34, after line 2, the committee report to insert the following:

Thirteenth. Federal land banks and national farm-loan associations as provided in section 26 of the act approved July 17, 1916, entitled "An act to provide capital for agricultural development, to create standard forms of investment based upon farm mortgage, to equalize rates of interest upon farm loans, to furnish a market for United States bonds, to create Government depositaries and financial agents for the United States, and for other purposes."

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I asked that that paragraph might go over, but I am quite sure that nothing I might say would change the determination of the committee to keep it in the bill. It is an exemption perhaps warranted under past practice of our legislation in behalf of Government institutions, but it takes a step toward discriminating agninst individual enterprise in the loaning of money to the farmers of the country not only by individuals but by State corporations. I shall not make any objection further.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This completes the committee amendments.

Mr. SIMMONS. As far as I know at present, those are all the amendments to be suggested by the committee.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have two amendments, which I propose to submit to the provision for a tariff board. Before doing so I ask unanimous consent that the Secretary read the letter I send the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Such will be the order unless there is objection. The Chair hears none.

The Secretary read as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., August 31, 1916.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I am glad of the opportunity to submit to you observations upon the tariff commission section of the revenue bill.

The demand for handling the tariff with the aid of a nonpartisan tariff commission comes from all parts of the land with great unanimity, and no group of citizens are more in earnest in this than those living on the farms of our country.

There are actively supporting us in this measure over 700 organizations comprising labor, agriculture, business, and other activities, and it is noteworthy that 96 per cent of all organizations considering it came out strongly in support of it. There has probably never been in the history of the country a more universal and insistent demand than there is for this pending measure.

The need for such a board is obvious. The industrial and commercial world will be remade when the great war is over and undoubtedly the sharpest competition ever known will be inaugurated for the markets of the world. The various countries will use their tariffs as a means to aid it in this struggle, which will become probably the most important factor in the game which we must play, and play it against the most highly trained intellects in the world. A strong and highly efficient tariff commission that has the confidence of our people and the respect of the world will be a vital factor in the preparedness for peace, and it is quite as necessary to prepare for peace as it is for war.

The tariff commission the people want is a big job for big men, and the people are ready to pay the bill. If the commissioners at the outset are discredited by lower rank and pay than other commissioners, some of which will be charged with less duties and responsibilities, the country will resent it. To say that the proposed pay is the same that Members of the Senate receive is not to the point. Senators hold positions of very high rank and of great honor. The pay is only incidental. One of the most distinguished majority Members said: "While I am not convinced a tariff commission would accomplish what its friends predict, it is clear that the people want to try the experiment and are ready to pay the bill, and it should be tried out with the best commission that can be had. Therefore I am for it and for compensation equal to that paid any other commission." This is a true interpretation of public sentiment.

If in its wisdom Congress shall hereafter determine that the salaries of all the commissioners are too high, would it not be more equitable to place the tariff commission at the outset upon the same basis as other commissions, and if a reduction is afterwards made no one can charge that the tariff commission had been discriminated against and discredited by being treated differently from other commissions.

Sincerely, yours,

HOWARD H. GROSS,
President Tariff Commission League.

Mr. GALLINGER. I offer the following amendment to the text of the bill. I trust the Senator from North Carolina will give it careful attention, and the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] as well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 136, lines 12 and 13, after the word "commission," insert the words "to conserve the industrial and commercial interests of the United States, to safeguard the American standards of wages, and"; and after the word "fiscal," in the same line, insert the words "and industrial." In line 22, on the same page, after the word "revenues," insert the words "their effect upon the industries and labor of the country"; and on page 137, line 12, after the words "preferential provisions," insert the words "economic alliances."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I simply want to say in a word, because I am not going to be guilty of detaining the consideration of the bill, I feel very sure that this strengthens the act and gives to the commission important duties that are not provided for in the bill as it now stands. It surely can do no harm to let it go to conference at least for the careful consideration of the conferees.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, the first one of the amendments, I think, is quite objectionable. I think it changes the character of the commission. I think it is the duty of Congress to consider legislation and not this commission. I think, therefore, the provision "that it shall be the duty of said commission to conserve the industrial and commercial interests of the United States, to safeguard the American standard of wages and to investigate the administration of fiscal effects," and so forth, ought not to be in the bill. It is the object of the commission to gather information primarily for the use of the Senate and the House, and I object to the provision. I think it is a duty that ought not to rest upon them, but which rests upon us after the information is gathered.

Mr. GALLINGER. What has the Senator to say about the other proposed amendment? Does the Senator object to those words?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I should like to dispose of the first one first.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will withdraw that, of course, if the Senator objects to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire withdraws the first part of the amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not object to the other suggestion going in; we will see in conference about it; but to the first I object.

Mr. GALLINGER. Very well.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It seems to me to evade our responsibilities.

Mr. GALLINGER. That has been withdrawn, I will say to the Senator.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That part of the amendment has been withdrawn by the proposer of it. The question is on the adoption of the remainder.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. I offer an additional amendment and then I am through.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 135, lines 19 and 20, strike out the words "a part of the classified civil service" and substitute the words "appointed from lists of eligibles to be supplied by the Civil Service Commission and in accordance with the civil-service law."

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. My view has been that the language used by the House means exactly the same as the language used by the Senator from New Hampshire and I do not object to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PHELAN. I call for the reading of the amendment I presented.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from California presents an amendment which the Secretary will state.

The SECRETARY. Add at the end of the bill a new section as follows:

SEC. —. That whenever, during the existence of a war in which the United States is not engaged, the President shall be satisfied that there is reasonable ground to believe that under the laws, regulations, or practices of any belligerent country or Government, American ships or American citizens or firms composed in part of American citizens, or American companies or corporations are not accorded any of the facilities of commerce, including the unhampered traffic in mails, which the vessels or citizens, firms, companies, or corporations of that belligerent country enjoy in the United States or its possessions, or are not accorded by such belligerent equal privileges or facilities of trade with vessels or citizens, firms, companies, or corporations of any nationality other than that of such belligerent, the President is hereby authorized and empowered, in his discretion, to deny to the citizens, firms, companies, or corporations of such belligerent countries the use of the United States mails, or the facilities of any express company engaged in interstate commerce, or of any telegraph, wireless, or cable company; and in such case he shall make a proclamation stating the denial of the use of the mails, or of the facilities of such express, telegraph, wireless, or cable company, or any or all of them, and the name of the country to whose citizens such privilege or privileges are denied.

Upon the making of such proclamation the use of said mails or facilities of such express, telegraph, wireless, or cable company by any citizen, firm, company, or corporation so prohibited shall be unlawful; and the President may change, modify, revoke, or renew such proclamation as in his opinion the public good may require.

Any person, firm, company, or corporation and its servants and employees who shall make such prohibited use of the mails or express, telegraph, wireless, or cable companies or either of them or shall furnish such facilities of either mails or express, telegraph, wireless, or cable company to such person, firm, company, or corporation contrary to such proclamation shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and shall be punished by a fine of not less than $2,000 nor more than $10,000 or by imprisonment for not more than one year, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, the committee accepts the amendment offered and will let it go to conference.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STERLING. I offer the following amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state it.

The SECRETARY. On page 136, strike out section 90 and in lieu insert:

SEC. —. That it shall be the duty of said commission to investigate the cost of production at home and abroad upon all articles which are or might be now or hereafter, the subject of tariff legislation, with special reference to the prices paid for domestic and for foreign labor, the hours of service, and the standard of living; also the prices paid for raw materials, whether domestic or imported, entering into manufactured articles, for the purpose of determining the differences between the cost of manufacturing such articles in the United States and articles of foreign manufacture of similar kind and quality; the importing cash price plus expenses and the tariff thereon at the United States port of entry; and shall tabulate and set forth all detailed information obtainable with respect thereto, and particularly as to the amount of revenue that the several articles, respectively, have produced under the various tariff acts of the United States, the amount of revenue at the time being produced thereon under any existing tariff act, and, so far as the same can be determined or estimated, the effect upon the revenue of raising or lowering the tariff rate a stated amount, and all other information that may be useful to enable Congress to ascertain as nearly as possible whether or not a tariff duty thereon is necessary or expedient, and if so, what the rate should be. In reaching its conclusion the commission may take into account the difference in the cost and standard of living at home and abroad by the workers engaged in the industry.

It shall be the duty of the commission to make, or cause to be made, a study of the classification of the various items that appear in the existing tariff enactment and the classification of similar articles in any tariff schedule of the principal commercial countries of the world, for the purpose of ascertaining whether the several items are fairly and properly classified, and if not, to make such recommendations as will properly fix the status of such items in the tariff schedules.

The commission is hereby empowered and directed to formulate, publish and establish such rules and regulations as it may deem expedient for receiving persons who desire to present to the commission any matter of business pertinent to or coming within the scope of its duties.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I simply wish to say that the language of this amendment is not original with me. The language is taken from a tariff-commission bill proposed by the Chamber of Commerce of the United States, which, by a referendum vote of 715 to 9, declared in favor of a tariff commission.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that the language of this proposed amendment is incomparably superior to the language of the bill prescribing the duties of the tariff commission. If we will examine that language, we will find that it is very general, that it is in instances vague and indefinite, and it is hard to determine just what the commission is to do from the very general language of section 90 as found in the bill.

The amendment I propose suggests an investigation in regard to a most important subject, that of the difference between the cost of production abroad and the cost of production at home. Otherwise, too, the amendment is very full and explicit and states exactly what information we want, what information Congress should have from the efforts and from the investigations made by the tariff commission.

I think any impartial reader of the two provisions will see that the one I suggest as a substitute for the one in the bill is far superior. I hope it will receive favorable consideration.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I hope the amendment of the Senator from South Dakota will be rejected. Sections 90 and 92 together cover the scope of the general work of the commission, and they are amply broad enough to make an investigation upon these lines.

The commission is furthermore subject at all times to the direction of the Committee on Finance of the Senate and the Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives to furnish information that we require for legislative purposes. They are also subject to the direction of the President to furnish information to aid in certain lines of diplomacy or in the enforcement of our rights of trade as they may be affected by foreign countries. Without further discussion, I urge that the amendment be rejected.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, if I may be permitted a word, section 92 covers for the most part an altogether different subject. It is not referred to in the substitute which I suggest to section 90. Section 92 has for its main object the investigation of treaties and the consideration of preferential provisions in treaties with foreign countries. The language confers power, among other things, to investigate—the effect of export bounties and preferential transportation rates, the volume of importations compared with domestic production and consumption.

It further states, as a part of the powers of the commission, the power to investigate—conditions, causes, and effects relating to competition of foreign industries with those of the United States—including dumping and cost of production.

Now, note—

That is the only reference whatever in all this bill to a consideration of the cost of production, and there it is simply incidentally mentioned. The natural inference would be that the cost of production is to be considered in connection with the dumping of foreign goods upon the American market, and that is all. No comparative study in the cost of production is anywhere required.

Mr. President, we have always considered that as one of the most important subjects connected with tariff revision, namely, the difference between the cost of production at home and abroad, and the regulation of our tariff rates accordingly. Why should not this provision, prescribing the duties of a tariff commission, make it a part of their duty—a great part of their duty—to ascertain the difference between the cost of producing here at home and abroad?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the Senator from South Dakota. [Putting the question.] The "noes" seem to have it.

Mr. STERLING. I ask for a division, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The "noes" have it.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, is it too late to call for the yeas and nays on this proposition?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Yes, sir; the matter has been disposed of.

Mr. STERLING. I bow to the decision of the Chair.

Mr. CUMMINS. I desire to offer two amendments, which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa offers an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 134, in lines 21 and 22, it is proposed to strike out the words "the President shall also designate biennially the chairman and vice chairman," and to insert after the word "succeed," in line 1, on page 135, the words "the President shall designate annually the chairman and vice chairman of the commission," and on page 135, line 9, strike out the figures "$7,500" and to insert "$10,000."

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I recognize that I have offered two amendments. I do not ask that they both be voted on at the same time. I call the attention of the chairman of the committee to the obvious error in lines 21 and 22, on page 134. The language is:

The first members appointed shall continue in office for terms of two, four, six, eight, ten, and twelve years, respectively, from the date of the passage of this act, the term of each to be designated by the President. The President shall also designate biennially the chairman and vice chairman, but their successors shall be appointed for terms of 12 years.

A single glance at the language as at present arranged shows that what I ask shall be lifted out of its connection there and transferred to the top of page 25 ought to be concurred in. Certainly the successors of the chairman and vice chairman are not to be appointed for terms of 12 years.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The language in lines 21 and 22 evidently has gotten a little out of place.

Mr. CUMMINS. Precisely. One way to correct it is to transfer the words "the President shall also designate biennially the chairman and vice chairman" to another point in the paragraph; and a good point is after the word "succeed," on line 1, page 135.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I think that is right, and I accept the amendment. Then, after the word "President," in line 21, there should be a comma instead of a period.

Mr. CUMMINS. Yes. I assume that so much of the amendment would be readily accepted.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I think that that transposition should be made.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the Senator from Iowa and the Senator from Georgia have come to some agreement about the matter, will they state it sufficiently plain that it may be understood at the desk?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I ask that the change suggested by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] be approved by the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That part of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa, which is referred to by the Senator from Georgia, will be agreed to, unless there is objection. The Chair hears none.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I do not want to get anything under a misapprehension. My amendment in its entirety means really more than the mere transposition of the phrase. The amendment provides that the designation by the President of the chairman and vice chairman shall be annually instead of biennially. Does the Senator from Georgia also think that is wise?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I should like to ask the Senator from Iowa why he thinks it is more desirable that the appointment should be made annually?

Mr. CUMMINS. It is thought desirable for this reason: The effort in this bill—and I am entirely in sympathy with it, so far as that point is concerned—is to create a commission which shall reflect the varying political or economic opinions of the political parties. It is, therefore, to be composed of persons no more than three of whom shall be members of one political party. It seems, therefore, that it is wise as nearly as possible, to get the chairman of the commission in political or economic harmony with the President of the United States, and it would, as it seems to me, be wise to permit the President to designate the chairman and vice chairman every year.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not see any special objection to that. I suppose the theory of their being appointed every two years was that Congress would work with the board, and the bill having been brought into the House that the same chairman and vice chairman would act through an entire Congress. I am perfectly willing, however, for the change suggested by the Senator from Iowa to be made providing for their appointment annually. We shall in conference ascertain why the House wanted the appointment to be made biennially. The usual rule here is an annual appointment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 134, lines 21 and 22, it is proposed to strike out the words "The President shall also designate biennially the chairman and vice chairman" and insert after the word "succeed," in line 1, page 135, the words "The President shall designate annually the chairman and vice chairman of the commission."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Unless there is objection to the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa, it will be agreed to. The Chair hears none.

Mr. CUMMINS. Now I offer the second amendment contained on the paper which I sent to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 135, line 9, it is proposed to strike out "$7,500," the amount of the salary of each commissioner, and insert in lieu thereof "$10,000."

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I can hardly hope that the distinguished Senator from Georgia will agree with me with respect to the amendment now before the Senate. If I had not discussed the matter with him personally, I would have assumed that his wise, comprehensive judgment and liberal view of public affairs would lead him to the conclusion that the Tariff Commission ought to be paid as liberally as any commission we have organized, but, having heard his view of it, I am compelled to say a word in support of the amendment I have offered.

I do not think it can be said that this Congress has been disposed toward the utmost economy. There has been a liberal spirit prevailing, which has met with some criticism now and then, but which at least is sure evidence that we are looking at national affairs from a broad and generous standpoint. The effort here to reduce the salaries of these commissioners, if successful, will save $15,000 per year, but it will be saved, Mr. President, at tremendous cost; it will be saved by disparaging from the very beginning the dignity and position of this commission in the affairs of the country.

We have an Interstate Commerce Commission, the members of which, I believe, receive $10,000 annually. I do not say that the Tariff Commission will be a more important body than the Interstate Commerce Commission, but I do assert that if the Tariff Commission fulfills the expectation of those who have advocated that method of dealing with this intricate subject in the past, it will be fully as important a body as the Interstate Commerce Commission. Many of us here have passed through two revisions of the tariff—many Members of the Senate have passed through more than two revisions of the tariff—and granting the utmost industry, the immense, if not impossible, difficulties encountered by those who are charged with the duty of framing tariff laws will be remembered by everyone who has had anything whatsoever to do with the subject.

We need, Mr. President, a commission that can take the most comprehensive view of the commercial affairs of the United States, that can understand the relation which the people and the commerce of other lands bear to our people and our commerce, a commerce which will be constantly growing, a commerce which is daily becoming more intricate, a commerce which every year surpasses in volume and value the commerce of any other country in the world.

We are creating a commission which we hope will be helpful to the people of this country, and especially helpful to Congress in dealing with foreign countries. The commission really rises above, in point of dignity—or, if not in dignity, at least, in importance—the Department of State. While the Department of State deals with the subject diplomatically, the tariff commission will deal with it commercially; and if we intend to create it at all, let us give it the standing, let us give it the position, let us give it the reputation which will make it influential in the legislation which is to follow.

We gave the members of the Interstate Commerce Commission $10,000 a year. When we organized the Federal Reserve Board, a board which, in my opinion, while, of course, important, as all these boards and commissions are, does not approach in the value of its work and the difficulty of its work the tariff commission, we gave the members of that board $12,000 per year. We organized the Federal Trade Commission; and without speaking of its work or its value, both of which I think are great, we gave to each member of that commission $10,000 a year, and it was not until the other day, when we were creating a still further commission, known as the Shipping Board, that we reduced the compensation below $10,000. I have not any idea that that standard of compensation will be permanent. I think we ought to give the members of the Tariff Board $10,000 a year, and if we do not do it it will be conclusive evidence to me that my friends on the other side of the Chamber are not altogether sincere in the establishment of the Tariff Commission, or, at least, do not comprehend or appreciate the character of the work which the commission should do.

I desire, Mr. President, inasmuch as it is fashionable here to argue through the newspapers, to insert as part of my remarks upon this subject an editorial found in the Washington Herald of Monday, September 4, headed "The Tariff Commission."

I also desire to append to my remarks, as a part of them, an article in the New York Times of September 4, entitled "The Tariff Commission"; also a very short editorial in the New York World of September 1, entitled "Salaries to Fit the Work," and a still briefer editorial in the New York Times of August 25, entitled "The Tariff Commission." All these editorials are persuasive arguments in favor of establishing a fair and reasonable compensation for the commission we are about to create. I send them to the desk and ask leave to publish them as part of my remarks.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The request of the Senator from Iowa will be complied with, unless there is objection. The Chair hears none.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[From the Washington Herald of Monday, Sept. 4, 1916.]

THE TARIFF COMMISSION.

Congress is finishing a notable session. Within the next day or two it will dispose of the revenue bill that carries with it the Rainey tariff commission measure. All parties are fully committed to this feature, for which there has been and there is an insistent and country-wide demand. The Rainey bill, as it was reported by the Ways and Means Committee, fully and fairly met the need of the Government and the demands of the people. It carried, with the approval of the President, of the general public, and practically the entire press, a permanent appropriation of $300,000, one that by the terms of the bill would automatically go on from year to year until changed by an act of Congress. Hence in all discussion of this body the word "permanent" attaches. When we recall the experience of the Civil Service Commission in its early career, how it was badgered and mauled about and its appropriation held up and its life made a burden by political pressure coming from all sides, the need of protecting the tariff commission with a permanent appropriation is apparent.

There can be no doubt that the country wants a tariff commission of the highest rank and as well paid certainly as other commissions.

It looks to the President and the Democratic Party to fully and fairly meet the obligation. To discredit and demote this body in creating it will raise the question of good faith. The proposition to cut the salaries of the tariff commission from 25 to 40 per cent below other boards created by this administration is unjust and indefensible. The psychological effect will be to discount in advance the standing of the commission and belittle its work. To attempt to justify this cut from $10,000 to $7,500 on the plea that this is all the Members of Congress are paid is inane and pointless. No Member of either House would admit he was serving for the salary.

The tariff commission is a man's-size job, it calls for the best talent available, and the public is ready to pay the bill. The Republicans should aid in restoring this measure and not content themselves by throwing monkey wrenches into the machinery.

[From the New York Times of Monday, Sept. 4, 1916.]

THE TARIFF COMMISSION.

This Congress has appointed a baker's dozen of commissions. The standard of pay beginning with the tariff commission is to be not more than what Senators receive. Even the Senators are not agreed about this innovation. The Democratic caucus has voted two ways about it, and the difference of opinion has been referred to the full Senate. Perhaps the Senators think that both themselves and the future commissions ought to be paid more.

One way of arriving at a standard of pay is comparison with the pay of other commissions. The tariff commission is to be tagged with the lowest of the lot, either the creation of this Congress or of other Congresses. The Taft Tariff Commission had the use of $250,000 in a lump sum. The salary charge of the next tariff commission is to be $45,000. After voting a couple of billions the Senate thought that economy was a necessity, and it resolved to save $15,000 in the salaries of half a dozen commissioners who are charged with functions rivaling even those of the Interstate Commerce Commission in importance to every industrial enterprise. At every angle the productive resources of this country will be concerned with the competence of the tariff commission, and hardly less with the common estimate of its prestige. It is good Republican doctrine that a cheap man is worse than a cheap coat. It is on the point of being enacted Democratic doctrine that no commissioner can be too cheap to make a tariff, since Congress will make the tariff according to its own judgment, anyway.

In that case, why have any tariff commission? Why not save all the salaries? The other way would be to have a tariff commission worth while and paid accordingly. No salary in reason would be excessive for a tariff commission which should speak with the authority of the Federal Reserve Board, or the Rural Credit Board, and so through the long list of this Congress's commissions. But this tariff commission is belittled by the act of appointment. When it is underpaid it is underrated, and notice is served that its recommendations will be lightly esteemed.

The country may be so fortunate as to get a tariff commission which shall impose its views by the strength of their reason, but Congress, if it adheres to its present ideas about the market value of talent of that sort, will have done its best to make it unlikely, and to make it difficult to discover it, if it shall be so. If it was Republican perfidy and dishonor to fail to fulfill the people's mandate to revise the tariff in the manner which they intended, it is something of the same quality to begin the Democratic revision in a manner equally promising of unworthy results. The country wants a tariff worth its cost, not the cheapest sort of tariff the cheapest commission can produce for the mangling of Congress.

[From the New York World of Sept. 1, 1916.]

SALARIES TO FIT THE WORK.

If the purpose of Congress in creating a tariff commission is to obtain the service of first-class men whose investigations shall command respect, that end will not be furthered by providing for the payment of inadequate salaries. Second-rate men will be dear at any price.

Members of the Interstate Commerce Commission, the Federal Trade Commission, and the Rural Credits Commission receive salaries of $10,000 each, and members of the Federal Reserve Board salaries of $12,000. It would be a poor kind of economy to discriminate against the tariff commission, whose duties will be no less important.

The salary of tariff commissioner in the new revenue bill was fixed by the House Ways and Means Committee at $10,000, but was reduced by the House to $7,500. In turn, the Senate Finance Committee recommended $10,000, but for unknown reasons in the Democratic caucus it was cut to $7,500. It is late in the day, if Congress is sincere, to enforce this form of retrenchment, in view of the part the commission is destined to take in future revisions of the tariff.

Both parties are committed to the principle of a tariff commission. The establishment of a permanent Government agency competent to make a thorough, impartial study of all aspects of the tariff question and the tariff relations of the United States and other countries has been insistently demanded by leading commercial associations of the United States. As far as possible it gives promise that the tariff shall be divorced from partisanship and raised to the plane of a fiscal and trade problem. But it is not through low salaries that a commission qualified to serve Congress as it needs to be served will be secured.

[From the New York Times of Aug. 25, 1916.]

THE TARIFF COMMISSION.

A commission which should speak upon tariff subjects with such authority that they would be taken out of politics would be of great value. A commission of caliber so small that Congress should feel free to slight if not to insult it would be dear at any price. According to present arrangements the country is to be supplied with the worthless sort of commission upon a false plea of economy. The reason is plain. The tariff is a subject which concerns the entire country, but no Congressman represents the country. The Congressmen represent local districts, each of which takes a selfish view of its own interests regarding the industries situated there. Individually the Congressmen take even a narrower view, many of them voting regarding the tariff with reference to such unrelated subjects as how the Germans in any given district are likely to vote. Moreover, there is a regrettable abundance of evidence that Congress intends to retain the control of the tariff legislation in its own hands for what there is in it.

Never has the advice of a tariff commission been effective. There is no new way of making a tariff. The present tariff proposals, whatever their merit, have been reached in the old bad way of closet negotiations, with resultant benefit to producers in the name of patriotism, but at the cost of consumers, and without benefit to wage earners. It would be easy to argue for or against a tariff commission upon theory, but it is not possible to sustain on the merits Congress's treatment of the subject. Practically, notice is given in advance that the commission contemplated is held so cheap that the investment in it is waste, except for the incidental political benefits.

The members of the Federal Reserve Board receive $12,000 each and are worth more. The Federal trade commissioners have $10,000 and are working hard on a difficult subject. The tariff commissioners are thought worth no more than $7,500 apiece, $45,000 for the commission. This from a Congress which found $20,000,000 for a nitrate plant. Moreover, the tariff-commission appropriation is not made permanent, and its power to lease premises is restricted to two years. If the office were honorary and honored, public spirit might lead to acceptance of the positions for nothing. If the salary were adequate, men worth more money might be induced to make a sacrifice for the opportunity of influencing public affairs. But when Congress practically advertises that it holds the commission in disesteem, and proposes to act independently of its advice, even men worth $7,500 would hesitate to accept the duties so cheapened. The sort of tariff commission which confronts the country is one of political hacks, for campaign purposes only.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I wish to assure the Senator from Iowa that my insistence that the salary fixed by the House shall remain as the salary of this commission is in no sense a reflection upon the commission. A few days ago we had before us the creation of a shipping board, a commission to take charge of the utilization of the $50,000,000, with many other duties in regard to shipping and commerce by water transportation. Upon my motion the salary of $10,000 provided by the bill was reduced to $7,500. I really desired to cooperate to reduce the salaries of the Farm Loan Board, and intended to do so, but I found that as to parts or the whole of the legislation I was perhaps committed, and did not feel myself free to reduce it. I shall vote to reduce that salary to $7,500 just as soon as a bill can be presented. I think the salaries of the members of the Federal Trade Commission should be reduced to $7,500. I think that is ample. I think we will get the same men to serve gladly at $7,500 who serve at $10,000 on each of these boards. I would, perhaps, make an exception in the case of the Interstate Commerce Commission. I do not think the labors of any of these boards, including the tariff board, will be in any way commensurate with those of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

We only pay judges of the United States circuit court of appeals, I believe, $7,500. They are the very ablest men in the land, or should be. The time is past when the service of a Senator or a Member of the House is confined to a few months each year. Men who serve in these bodies, and really do their work, must give up everything else and devote their whole time to the service. I believe we will do our work better here in Washington, and we will have better service from these commissions, if we do not pay them over $7,500 a year. I think they will listen better to the advice of a Senator if they have not been put on a financial pedestal above a Senator. I think that when a Senator comes with information about affairs in his State he ought not to have to hang around one of these bureau men and try to persuade him as to a State problem. I think they should realize their responsibility to the legislative body and to the representatives from the States to Washington, the Members of the United States Senate.

I am opposed to paying any of these new boards that we have created over $7,500 a year. We have not bettered the service by doing so. We will get better service if we do not do it, in my judgment.

The Senator says he wants them to be influential. Why, we will select just as able men at $7,500. Their work is that of statisticians. I have no doubt some of them will be drawn from the colleges of the country—men who have devoted their lives to the study of problems of this kind. I am sure you will not improve the men by making the salary $10,000. What is their work? Not to legislate, not to pass finally upon the great problems of tariff taxation, but, as statisticians, to make investigations for us.

I wish just as able men of that class as can be found in the land. I object to this salary going to $10,000, because I wish to keep up the precedent we started when the shipping bill reached us, and then go back just as soon as we meet in December and reduce some of the salaries that we have improperly placed too high in the case of these commissions. I confess the blunder. I went along and only realized it when we had reached the Farm Loan Board; and I could not vote as I wished to, because I concluded that I would perhaps be breaking faith if I did it. But I intend to vote for a bill, if I have a chance, to reduce them to $7,500.

I wish to reiterate that it is not a reflection upon these men. I understand the Senator from Iowa has an amendment that he will offer to make the compensation continuous. I think we can accept that. I want this board as a permanent board. I believe in the necessity of such a board. I am most cordially in favor of it. I was in favor of it before an intimation came from the White House that the President was for it. I became in favor of it as the result of over three months of hard work, and not very valuable work, three years ago on the Finance Committee, when I realized my own need on that committee of some such permanent board to help members of the committee to know how to write schedules. We may know generally, but it is utterly impossible for us, with the other duties resting upon us as Senators, to make investigations that fit us at all to vote upon many of the propositions that come before the Finance Committee when tariff schedules are considered.

I want to insist that my view upon this subject does not involve any reflection upon this board. I believe we will have an able board, and I do not believe the salary we pay them will affect the character of the board at all.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I never have been very keen in behalf of a tariff board or a tariff commission. In fact, I have believed that a board of that kind would make more trouble than it would do good in the matter of legislation; but in looking over this little book I find that the Republican Party in its national convention declared in favor of a tariff commission, and for that reason I shall support it.

I am very glad, in looking at the bill, to note that the House of Representatives carefully avoided declaring in favor of a "nonpartisan" commission. In some remarks I made a few days ago I took occasion to say that in my judgment no man outside of a home for the feeble-minded could be nonpartisan on the question of the tariff, and I still hold to that view.

Mr. President, I hope this board will be composed of the very best men that can be found for the place, but I have grave fears that my hope will prove disappointing. The President of the United States, whom I quote sometimes approvingly and sometimes not, in an address delivered at St. Louis on February 3, 1916, said:

> Personally I look forward to the establishment of a tariff board with some misgivings, because I will have to choose the men that make it; and I tell you that men without prepossessions are hard to find, and when you find them they are generally empty of everything else. Gentlemen who have not done a lot of thinking and formed some very definite convictions are not very serviceable in public affairs; and, knowing that I have my due quota of prejudices and prepossessions myself and that I hold even my untested convictions in fighting spirit, I am not sure that I would be a suitable member of a tariff board.

Mr. President, that declaration is a sound one; and I sincerely trust that when the President of the United States comes to appoint this board he will forget that men have prepossessions and prejudices on this great question. They will have convictions to a greater or less extent, beyond a doubt, but it seems to me that this board should be largely composed of strong, able, vigorous, intelligent business men, and I hope that will be the result.

The Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] suggests that doubtless some of them will be taken from colleges. I have no prejudice against college men, but I could point the Senator to some colleges where the teaching on the question of protection and free trade is of a character that I think would disqualify those men from acting on a board of this kind.

I rose simply to say that I am glad the House carefully avoided, and that the Senate has likewise avoided, that catch phrase that we so frequently hear, "a nonpartisan commission," and, further, to express the hope that the President in appointing this board will follow precisely the line of reasoning in which he indulged in the speech that he made in St. Louis, but the President changes his mind so often that there is no assurance that his words will be crystallized into deeds.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I shall detain the Senate for only a moment. I merely wish to express my approval of the sentiments which have been uttered just now by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS]. I think the members of a board of this kind should receive salaries commensurate with its importance; and I am unable to understand or appreciate the system of reasoning which measures the compensation for every place by that received by Senators of the United States.

Generally speaking, a Senator is not entirely confined to his duties here. He has other opportunities, and perfectly legitimate ones, for adding to his salary, particularly if he is a member of the legal profession.

If we are to have the highest and the best talent of the country, which I hope will be secured, and if we are in earnest, as I know we are, in the establishment of this board—and I speak of the majority—we certainly should not even seem to withhold our complete and cordial sympathy and support of the board by reducing the salary to the sum of $7,500.

I trust, therefore, that the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa will be adopted.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I believe it will be for the better public interest to provide a salary of $10,000 rather than a salary of $7,500. The opportunities for men of ability in this country are so vast that it is a sacrifice in a pecuniary way for men who are really qualified to serve on this board to serve for a smaller salary, and however attractive the honor and opportunity to serve the public, men will be restrained by the feeling that it is not fair to their own families and dependents to sacrifice their own earning power to the public in exchange for position in public affairs.

It is natural, of course, that Members of the Senate should set the standard of compensation for other public servants at the same price fixed for Members of the Senate; but every Senator knows it is extremely difficulty for a Senator to live on the salary he receives in the dignity which modern social life seems to impose on a Senator. Many Members of this body, without any extravagances at all, expend twice the amount of their salaries in living here in Washington. I think it would be better for the dignity of this tariff commission to have a salary at least commensurate with the salaries paid to the other great commissions that are handling these most important administrative services. I do not think any of these services will prove to be more important than the service of this tariff commission, and for that reason I should support the salary of $10,000. This sum would be saved to the people thousands of times if this commission should meet the highest expectations and hopes of the country. It would not be an extravagance but an economy to make the savings of the larger by the expenditure of the less.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I must differ from the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] with relation to the amount of the salaries to be paid. There has been a tendency in later years to increase salaries of high officials to a point abnormally high, and it seems to me this tendency is demoralizing to the subordinate officers throughout the entire United States. We find that there is a continual stream of people trying to get increases of salary, due to a large extent to the high salaries we pay to members of commissions and boards. It is easy to spend other people's money. We do not seem to take into consideration the fact that these are high and honorable positions, and that there ought not to be in a republic extraordinarily high salaries.

Of course, some men who come here as Senators may expend $15,000 or $20,000 a year for living expenses, and yet at the same time we could not provide salaries by any gauge of that kind. The salaries of the Senators of the United States are large enough. These are high and honorable positions, and we will not get better service by an increase of salary.

Mr. President, this tariff commission which is being created is not a board whose members have any discretionary power of deciding anything of consequence. All that they do is to make reports as to facts without being permitted to make recommendations. Is it possible that you can compare the importance of that board with that of the Interstate Commerce Commission, whose decisions involve millions and sometimes hundreds of millions of dollars? Can it be compared with the Federal Reserve Board? I must say that I wanted the salaries of the Federal Reserve Board to be $10,000 each, and I wanted the salaries of the Federal Farm Loan Board to be $7,500 each.

Mr. President, there are a number of officers in the United States that perform greater duties with greater responsibilities, and who get insignificant salaries. If we are to increase salaries, I believe in increasing the lower ones instead of the higher ones. Why, Mr. President, take the Interior Department. Assistant Secretaries of the Interior get $5,000 or $4,500 a year—the First Assistant $5,000, and the Second Assistant $4,500 a year—and yet each year they pass upon questions involving millions of dollars to the Government. Is it fair to those men, unless you are going to change their salaries, to give to the members of a commission that has no responsibility so far as determining questions is concerned $10,000 salary, and yet give to the Assistant Secretaries of the Interior $5,000 or $4,500 a year?

Mr. President, it is not fair unless you go down and increase the entire schedule of salaries. Senators may think it is popular to have men in office at high salaries, but I will warrant you that if you should submit the question to a vote of the people you would find that no $10,000 salary would be given to this board or perhaps to any other board that has been created in the United States.

When this Government was organized, it started upon the principle of economy. It commenced with a salary for the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States of $3,500 a year. John Marshall, one of the greatest of all of the Chief Justices, served for 30 years for $3,500 a year. Nearly all the governors of our States get only $5,000 per year. Judge Cooley, one of the greatest judges of America, received only $3,000 per annum. The idea that because the salary is low you are not going to get good men is absolutely exploded. There has to be patriotism back of the office. There must be a feeling on the part of the applicant or on the part of the holder of the position that he wants to do something for his country; and then you will get the service, even if the salary is not as great as some other boards may draw.

Mr. President, I would have a good board. I am not very favorable to a tariff commission, yet I have acquiesced in it because I think some information can be obtained that would be valuable. I would not want a commission that would determine and fix tariff rates. I think that is a question which is always to remain with the Congress of the United States.

But, Mr. President, to say that these salaries shall be $10,000 would mean that no other boards ever will be created by Congress unless you fix the salary of the members at $10,000. As to the theory that the farmers or the people will not think that this board which gets for its members a salary of $7,500 is of as high dignity as one that gets $10,000, I do not believe the farmers entertain any such view. We have heard no protest about the members of the shipping board, recently created, receiving $7,500.

I agree with the Senator from Georgia that instead of salaries being kept up they ought to be reduced. The taxpayers have to pay large sums of money, and we should not set the standard at $10,000 a year when the assistant secretaries throughout all the departments of the Government have just as much work and just as much responsibility as two-thirds of these commissions, and yet they only draw half as much. If you are going to increase such salaries, you will have to make an increase in the Government expenditures that will be great indeed.

Mr. President, I hope that the provisions contained——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. And the salaries of circuit judges and district judges would have to be raised.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Of course, we would have to do that because they are men who are especially educated for such purpose. As the Senator from Georgia says, circuit judges who get $7,500 a year and judges of the United States district courts who get $6,000 a year, are men of great ability and they are holding those offices because they put into the service a degree of patriotism to try to make this Government give justice in the administration of the law. The man who goes into an office purely for making the money that is in it, solely to get a sum that he can spend easily, does not give the service that a man does who is prompted by patriotism to aid and assist his Government in its good work of administration.

Mr. CUMMINS. Will the Senator from Colorado answer a question?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. CUMMINS. When John Marshall was getting $3,500 a year what did Senators get?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I think they were getting $7 per day; that is my impression; but of course we started as a young republic and set out with the idea of economy, and that principle ought to prevail in a republic everywhere, because salaries of a gigantic amount tend toward monarchy. Monarchs always have had the theory of paying their high officers extravagantly and paying their subordinate officers exceedingly low. That widens the difference between the officeholder and clerk, between the aristocracy and the plain people. I believe more in equalizing these things and letting the men who have the low salaries have some increase and the men who are having such high salaries having a little reduction.

Mr. President, I hope that the House provision providing $7,500 will prevail.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, if this tariff commission is to be a permanent one, and if it is going to do what the advocates of the commission think it will accomplish, it must have a personnel of the very highest character.

I tried in this body to reduce the salaries of the members of the Federal Farm Loan Board from $10,000 to $7,500. I asked for the yeas and nays upon the amendment I offered reducing those salaries and it was overwhelmingly defeated. Nearly every Senator upon the other side of the Chamber voted against it. To compare the work that will be done by a tariff commission with the work that will be done by the Federal Farm Loan Board is to compare the work of a man with that of a child.

The Senator from Colorado says that the commissions and boards now created have millions of dollars to pass upon. Mr. President, if a tariff commission is to be anything more than a farce, and if the recommendations of that commission are to be considered seriously by Congress, and Congress is to act upon the recommendations or findings of the commission, then not only are millions but billions of dollars involved and the happiness and prosperity of the American people are involved.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I should like to get some information. The Senator may be right in what he says. Are there any findings to come from this board? As I read and have read the provisions of the bill, so far as they relate to this board, it is a board of statisticians; they are to accumulate data; but I do not find anything in it that they are to report a procedure to Congress. If the Senator has discovered something of that kind in the bill I should like to have him point it out to me.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to say to the Senator from Alabama, I think the provision creating a tariff commission ought to be amended. I believe if a tariff commission is to be created it ought to be a permanent commission.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. But I am talking about the work laid out for the commission. If there is anything in the bill authorizing the commission to report findings of fact in reference to what Congress should do or to make recommendations, I do not know of it, and if it is in there I would like to find it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Is it not perfectly clear that the commission is not to make any recommendation but simply furnish facts?

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator refers not to recommendations but reports?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Nothing but facts.

Mr. SMOOT. That is, reports. Whether they are facts or not, it is a report.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. As to merely accumulating statistical data, we pay men down here in the bureaus $2,500 a year to do that, and they make good reports.

Mr. SMOOT. If that is all the members of this commission are to do, and if that is the class of men to be appointed by the President, and if appointed for the purpose of collecting statistics as now published monthly by the Department of Commerce, then the creation of this commission is an absolute waste of money, and we ought to strike out the whole provision from the bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me, in some observations I made a few days ago, one of the criticisms I made on the bill was that there was no provision for a report; that it did not say to whom the report should be made. I have not read the bill carefully, and I will ask the Senator from Georgia if there is such a provision.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. They are to furnish the facts to Congress, to report to Congress.

Mr. SMOOT. I am fearful that it is the intent to create this a temporary commission.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let the Senator from Georgia answer me.

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If the Senator will permit me, my view of this commission is that they are to become students of the questions that are involved in our tariff legislation, and they are to be ready to furnish the Ways and Means Committee of the House and the Finance Committee of the Senate detailed and prompt information on all the lines, even suggested by an inquiry, if either view is entertained by a Senator. Both parties are represented, half and half, and the facts as far as they can work them out are to be gathered to help us determine what on each particular item we ought to do.

Mr. GALLINGER. Then they are to report to the two committees of Congress, and that would suggest that that will be when we are considering a tariff bill, which might not be more than once in five years. I think they ought to make reports to the Senate which would be printed for the information of the country.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. They are required to report annually.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will ask the Senator, if the Senator from Utah will allow me, if he contends that this commission is required to report anything but statistical facts? Is there anything in this proposed law requiring the commission to reach a conclusion and report upon it?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. On the contrary, I understand they have no such business.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Very well.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I would myself not be favorable to have that a part of their business. I think that responsibility rests upon Congress, and it ought to remain there.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It is merely creating an additional statistical bureau?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. One that is broader and more responsible and more permanent.

Mr. CUMMINS. May I interrupt the Senator from Utah?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. CUMMINS. Because, if the Senator from Alabama is right, I can not understand why the Senator from Georgia supports the measure. If the bill creates a mere statistical board, it is, of course, a pretense and a sham. But I think it does much more than that. I call the attention of the Senator from Utah to it in order that he may reply to the Senator from Alabama. A part of section 90 provides:

That it shall be the duty of said commission to investigate the administration and fiscal effects of the customs laws of this country now in force.

I do not read that to mean simply that it is to return to Congress the amount of revenue produced by the tariff law during the course of a year.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It does not mean that at all.

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly not. It requires the opinion of the board as well as its report upon the facts; and that is true of the entire section. But that is very narrow as compared with section 92, in which it is declared—

That the commission shall have power to investigate the tariff relations between the United States and foreign countries, commercial treaties, preferential provisions, the effect of export bounties and preferential transportation rates, the volume of importations compared with domestic production and consumption, and conditions, causes, and effects relating to competition of foreign industries with those of the United States, including dumping and cost of production.

If that does not give to the commission the authority to do something more than to collect tables of figures and to report to Congress I do not understand the English language.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It does more; it gives them the right to make a study of these questions, to make an investigation and comparison of them, to gather all the information involved in section 92, but I do not understand that they are to recommend the kind of legislation we are to pass.

Mr. CUMMINS. I suppose not, but it takes the biggest kind of a man to find out the facts in regard to those subjects. They are not confined to figures.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I am not asking for a legal man. I believe we can get just as capable men at $7,500 as at $10,000, and in all probability exactly the same men for the lower amount that we would get for the larger salary.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, as I stated when interrupted I am fearful that the tariff commission that is being created in this bill is to be a temporary affair. I am fearful that soon after the election the belief on the part of our Democratic friends will return, and that the tariff commission created by this bill will be as short lived as the commission which was created under the Republican administration, because of the refusal to make an appropriation for their work to continue.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. SMOOT. I wanted to get through very soon, but I will yield.

Mr. POMERENE. I want to ask, if I may, a question. The Senator expresses a fear that this is only to be a temporary measure. I have not seen or heard anything that would lead me to believe it was to be a temporary measure, and I should like to know what is the foundation of the Senator's fear?

Mr. SMOOT. Perhaps it would be just as well for me to quote some of the remarks made by leading Democrats of the country, from the President down, to which I called the attention of the Senate the other day.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator will just let me go on, I should like to answer the question of the Senator from Ohio, and then I will gladly yield to him.

THE PRESIDENT'S DEMAND FOR A TARIFF COMMISSION.

The President's demand for a tariff commission, the result of a sudden change of mind, his party has found difficult to understand. The chairman of the Ways and Means Committee stated in the House that the party, of which he is the leader in that body, until about two months before he brought in this remarkable bill was opposed to a tariff commission. But in this matter, as in many others, it promptly changed its mind on demand of the President. There was no call for reasons and no serious consideration given to the change, it being sufficient that the President asked for it. In his canvass in 1912 the President said, "I will not have any commissions playing Providence to me." Not long ago, in his Indianapolis speech, the President said that the establishment of a tariff commission was unnecessary, as the power had already been given to the Federal Trade Commission. The President said that in framing the Trade Commission law they had "slipped one over" on the Republicans in securing such power for the commission. That statement was not true, as the Republicans had not been deceived in the least in the matter; but while the President opposed such a commission and was in accord with his party in forcing out of existence the bipartisan commission that was in office at the time he was elected, he now asks for a commission.

The Democratic Party has always opposed a tariff commission. The one appointed by President Taft was indirectly authorized by the tariff law then in existence, as the Democrats prevented the passage of a bill to create such a commission. A tariff board, the Democrats held, was a useless expense, and such a conclusion was the only consistent one to accord with their theory of a tariff for revenue only.

The Democratic platform denounced a protective tariff as unconstitutional; and if the only object in framing a tariff law is to secure revenue, there is no necessity for any information from a tariff board. The present Speaker of the House of Representatives stated that "such a thing as a nonpartisan board is an impossibility in nature," and he declared that a tariff board was useless. Another leading Democrat in the House declared that the bill to create a tariff commission "violates a well-established and venerated principle in the doctrine of the Democratic Party." Another leading Democrat asked, "Why do men who believe in a tariff for revenue only want to know what it costs to make or not to make foreign goods that come in competition with our own?" The Senator from Alabama, former chairman of the Ways and Means Committee of the House, stated that he was "not in favor of a tariff commission and never had been." And from what I understand, the Senator is not in favor of one now and intends to move to strike the provision out of the bill.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The Senator is correct.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator added:

I am thoroughly opposed to a tariff commission in any form whatever.

The present Governor General of the Philippines, a former Member of the House, declared his belief that a tariff commission was—a useless expenditure of public money.

Adding:

I do not see any place in the framing of a Democratic tariff bill for revenue only for an inquiry into the difference of cost between production here and abroad. The purpose of such a commission bill is to harass and delay.

The present chairman of the Ways and Means Committee of the House declared that he had never known a Democratic district convention, a Democratic State convention, or a Democratic national convention to declare in favor of a tariff board or tariff commission of any kind. That was true enough until the last Democratic national convention adopted a plank, written by the President, in favor of this proposed commission. The junior Senator from Georgia said:

For one I stand on the traditional ground of opposition to these commissions, of opposition to legislation encroaching on the constitutional functions of Congress.

A Representative from Alabama, an associate of the junior Senator from that State, declared that a tariff board was "a makeshift and a false pretense." A leading Democratic Representative from Indiana [Mr. Cox] declared that the tariff board was "wrong in principle and wrong in policy."

A prominent Democrat from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] declared a tariff board—would be a surrender of the dearest of Democratic principles.

The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES] said:

I have always been against boards and commissions. I believe that the fathers of the Republic were wise, even wiser than they knew, when they lodged with the great House of Representatives of the people the right to formulate tariff legislation.

Another eminent Democrat quoted the well-known lines:

The Devil was sick, the Devil a monk would be;
The Devil was well, the devil a monk was he.

From which it would appear that that Member, now chairman of the Committee on Printing, thinks that the President is a pretty sick man politically, which is no doubt the case.

If we want to improve the system of tariff making we can do it by having Congress appoint a body of practical men who have had experience in business to aid in drawing up tariff schedules.

Such a body, however, should be merely a legislative auxiliary. It should work under the direction of the Ways and Means Committee of the House and the Finance Committee of the Senate, and aid these bodies in drawing up the tariff schedules.

The German system is to appoint a commission composed of leading business men, captains of industries, and agriculturists, and other experts. The last tariff commission consisted of 24 members, one-half nominated by the German Government, avowed and consistently protectionist in its policy, and one-sixth each being named by the Central Association of German Industrialists, the German Agriculture Council, and the German Commercial Diet, respectively. For the purpose of strengthening the commission there were appointed a great number of experts, representing all the principal industries and occupations, who took part in the proceedings relating to their respective interests.

The commission also received the hearty support of manufacturing, agricultural, and commercial associations all over the German Empire, all of whom freely placed their organizations, statistics, and so forth, at the disposal of the commission. That commission had no political complexion whatever, being entirely nonpartisan in its make-up. Political parties of Germany are not based on the tariff belief of individuals, as protectionists are found in all the great parties. Whenever the people of this country are united on the tariff, as are the people of Germany, such a commission could be appointed here. But as long as the Democratic Party is opposed to a protective tariff and holds it to be unconstitutional, although it protects various industries for sectional and political reasons, we can not have in this country the system of preparing the tariff that is followed in Germany. Whatever commission or board may be appointed must be for the purpose of gathering information for the assistance of Congress, which alone has the right to legislate on this subject, a right that can not be passed over to any other body.

The tariff can not be taken out of politics, for the simple reason that the tariff is politics. It has been the leading issue in this country for a great many years, and will continue to be until the Democrats give up their old free-trade views. The national revenues are vitally affected by the tariff.

The Democrats are aiming to enforce in this country the British free-trade system, which was referred to with approval in the report on this bill in the House of Representatives. Their legislation ever since they came into control of the Government under President Wilson has been in the direction of raising the revenue from direct taxation instead of imposing taxes on foreigners who sell in this market. If they are continued in power, they will keep on in that same direction and we will have the English system, including the enormous number of paupers which are characteristic of that system.

The provision in regard to the tariff commission requires that it shall—> investigate the administration and fiscal effects of customs laws now in force or to be hereafter enacted, the effects of ad valorem and specific duties, and the operation and effects of tariff laws, including their relations to the Federal revenues.

A report on the "effect" of a tariff law can only be an expression of opinion of the men making the report.

The Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] in a published article regarding the Russo-Japanese pact says that the proposed tariff commission is to deal with this question and also with the arrangement between France and England and the other allied powers in regard to trade in Europe. Imagine a commission made up of such experts as those publicly mentioned for members of this commission dealing with such exhaustive subjects as those mentioned by the Senator, subjects which would require the closest attention of the Secretary of State and the President.

The Baltimore platform of the Democratic Party told us about all the "effects" of the tariff; how it caused the high cost of living, the trust evils, the extravagant appropriations, and so forth, all of which were to be reformed by the Democratic tariff. Well, we have had the Democratic tariff for some three years and more; the cost of living is immensely higher, expenditures have been enormously increased, while taxes have been piled so high that an ordinary man finds difficulty in paying his share. Each session of Congress we have bills to still further increase these taxes, and what the end will be if the Democrats remain in power no man can tell. The people know from experience of the vast thousands of empty freight cars, the closed factories, the millions of idle workmen, the soup kitchens, and other such things that accompany Democratic tariff laws. The sad experience under the existing law before the war in Europe changed things is a lesson that will not be forgotten.

DEMOCRATIC INCONSISTENCY.

The President thinks that this Tariff Commission that he is to appoint can in a short time solve the problems that have aroused the attention of Congress for over a century. It is such vain ideas that explain the President's sudden change of mind. The reports of the Taft bipartisan Tariff Commission, which were signed by all the members of the commission, were contemptuously kicked aside in both the House and Senate, on the theory that cost of production at home and abroad had nothing to do with the revenue tariff. If a protective tariff is unconstitutional and immoral, if the National Government has, as the Democratic national platform in 1912 asserted, no right to foster private enterprise by tariff adjustments, and if the duty on imports is added to the price paid by the consumer, and is therefore an unjust form of taxation, how senseless it is to create a tariff commission to look into foreign and domestic production cost. Mr. Bryan declares in the Commoner that the party in power gained ascendancy through a pledge to the people that it was against the protective policy. He wants the party to be honest and stand by that issue, asserting that if it equivocates on the tariff question it will be "laughed out of court." That is true enough, but it does not appeal to the President, or the party he controls. This tariff commission clause in the bill, the duty on dyes, the antidumping provision, and other things show that votes and not consistency govern the Democratic Party at the present time.

The head of the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce does not always speak with the authority of the President, but in a recent address he seems to have been using some information from the White House. He declared that the proposed tariff board would gather such information and furnish such data as would be necessary for reciprocity treaties with other nations. He says that this will make it possible for the United States to bargain actively for foreign trade, particularly with Latin America. If any such result were possible the Underwood tariff law would have to be materially changed, and the President has recently declared his opposition to any such change.

That law has not only been a miserable failure as a revenue producer, but it practically made it impossible to negotiate reciprocity treaties which the Democrats have opposed. Nearly all the important products of Latin America are either admitted free or else at such low rates of duty as to close the way to any reciprocity agreement. The Democratic leaders at the time of the passage of that law took particular pains to inform the public that the rates were revenue rates only; that there was not a line of protection in the bill. If a rate is laid for revenue only, how can we bargain with a country by making a rate still lower or abolishing it altogether when the revenue is so notoriously inadequate?

The talk about a scientific tariff has no sound foundation. There really is not anything in existence known as a scientific tariff anywhere. Tariffs are imposed either for revenue or protection, and plain business judgment is used, or should be, in fixing rates. Free trade has been England's popular method of the best way to carry forward its business as the middleman and skilled artisan to use other nations' raw materials. A "fighting" or "trading" discriminatory tariff is the exponent of Germany's commercial genius. The American tariff as it at present exists is a hodgepodge production of the Democratic Party, which is getting ready to change it. France has a tariff devised to suit her own particular interests. A national body to act in an advisory capacity to the French Government is now being formed under the auspices of the Chamber of Commerce of Paris, with a view of tariff changes. The association of all important lines of industry will be represented by technical experts in this French body. Russia is preparing to arrange her tariff and commercial treaties so as to bring about "economic independence" and to develop new industries. All of the European nations excepting England are on a protective bases. All South America is rearranging tariffs, some countries temporarily putting on duties, and nearly all considering complete revisions within a few years, with a view of getting better results in stimulating feasible industries. Even England is making changes, and is seriously talking about tariffs to build up her chemical industry and others, and to use in connection with her political and financial arrangements with other countries. No nation has a tariff commission such as that proposed by the President. The German commission is not in any sense, when it is in existence, similar to that proposed by the President. Austria-Hungary has ministeries of commerce in both kingdoms which have jurisdiction over internal and external industry and commerce, with broad regulatory powers covering the field of our Interstate Commerce Commission, Federal Trade Commission, and Departments of Commerce, Labor, Interior and Post Office.

The ministers are virtual heads of the commercial organizations of the kingdoms, which are autonomous but semiofficial, and so responsible to the Government. Regular parliamentary sessions are held at frequent intervals of a body consisting of 75 representatives from each half of the dual monarchy, part elected by technical associations of industry, part appointed by the Government from the membership of chambers of commerce. The two ministers of commerce, the minister of justice, the minister of finance, and the minister of foreign relations, with a subordinate especially delegated to specialize upon commercial diplomacy, are also part of this parliament, whose recommendations regarding tariffs and commercial diplomacy are almost invariably followed by the legislative body and by the foreign relations minister of Austria-Hungary.

Holland has a commission that consists of the heads of the "waterstaat," commerce, industry, colonial affairs, and justice ministers, together with officially appointed members selected by the Government from commercial, industrial, and shipping circles of the country. It supplies information to the Government in regard to all changes of the tariff. The English Board of Trade, which is a Government department, does like work for the United Kingdom. Russia has been developing machinery to operate in regard to new tariffs, and there are a number of influential organizations which may be called upon in a semiofficial advisory connection.

There never has been a really scientific tariff, for the reason that these laws are devised for specific purposes in the different countries, and views differ in other countries, as they do in the United States, as to what is best to accomplish the purpose sought. But the United States is the only great country in the world in which the two leading parties make the tariff their principal dividing line.

Mr. President, I could go on and quote from the Democratic leaders of the House and Senate all day long. It is for that reason I say with the actions that have manifested themselves at this time the tariff commission proposed in the bill is in danger of being but a temporary affair.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. THOMAS. I ask the Senator if he could not quote similar sentiments from the speeches of some of the Republican Senators in 1911 during the consideration of the tariff board bill?

Mr. SMOOT. There were perhaps three Republican Senators at that time who made speeches in opposition to the tariff commission, as the Senator has stated.

Mr. THOMAS. Is it not a fact that the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] forced a vote upon that measure by preventing the reaching of an agreement for a vote upon the Lorimer resolution until that matter was disposed of?

Mr. SMOOT. I do not remember as to the details.

Mr. THOMAS. I refer the Senator to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. SMOOT. But it makes no difference whether it was or was not, as far as my argument is concerned or as far as the particular Tariff Commission that is to be created under the bill is concerned.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. McCUMBER. I wish to ask the Senator from Utah what authority or what duty has this board to perform that is not included within the law which created the Trade Commission? Are we not in fact duplicating the same labors that were imposed upon the Trade Commission? Are they not required to report on all these matters pertaining to our trade, and that means the cost of production, and so forth, in other countries, and to advise Congress concerning them?

Mr. SMOOT. The President thought so; and as far as the law itself is concerned I believe it authorizes the Trade Commission to do so. But there has been a sentiment in this country, growing very rapidly of late, for the creation of a tariff commission.

Mr. McCUMBER. If we have created a commission that is supposed to do this work——

Mr. SMOOT. It is not doing the work.

Mr. McCUMBER. Why should we duplicate it in providing another commission to do the same thing before we have changed our law?

Mr. SMOOT. I will say, as far as the Federal Trade Commission is concerned, they are not doing that class of work.

Mr. McCUMBER. But they are authorized to do it, are they not?

Mr. SMOOT. Perhaps there is no appropriation made to do it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If the Senator will allow me——

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I think it could hardly be claimed that that law contemplates the study of our foreign trade relations and the detailed work that this bill puts upon the tariff board. I want to say that after serving on the Committee on Finance of the Senate for the past three years and a half I myself believe it is as much as six of the ablest men we can find, excluding all other kinds of work from their study, can do to master the details of this problem.

Mr. McCUMBER. I will agree with that.

Mr. SMOOT. Of course I can not agree with the Senator from Georgia in relation to just what the Federal trade act authorizes. I think myself that under that act the Federal trade board could go into every question that is really incorporated in the creation of this commission, but everyone knows that it was not created for that purpose. Everyone knows what the people of the United States expect that board to do. They are not expected to investigate questions involved in our fixing rates of duty on importations.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It is as much as any six men can do.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If the Senator from Utah will yield while we are on this subject, there is not a line in the bill that is not a duplication. If it is not the duty of the Federal Trade Commission then the law establishing the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce of the Department of Commerce covers everything, because this bill is almost copied from the language creating the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce; and then there is the work of the Census Bureau in gathering facts. Everything that this commission is called on to do is absolutely duplicated either in the Federal Trade Commission or the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce or the Census Bureau.

Mr. SMOOT. Of course, Mr. President, I have to admit that what the Senator from Alabama has just stated is in the main true, and I will say frankly to the Senator that that is the only excuse I think he can give for the striking out of the provision; and yet, on the other hand, there has been a sentiment in this country, as I stated, for a tariff commission whose only and sole duty shall be the collection of the information as directed in the pending bill.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Now, if the Senator will just yield a moment, I will not interrupt him further. Is not that sentiment throughout the country really for a commission that would fix tariff rates? Of course the Senator and I know that such a commission could not be created, but from what I read in the papers and from what I hear from business men's speeches and what I read in magazine articles they all reach the conclusion that these men want a tariff commission with the idea that it is going to fix rates, not give information.

Mr. McCUMBER. All of them, if the Senator will allow me, declare that the subjects should be taken out of politics.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. McCUMBER. That is exactly what they mean.

Mr. SMOOT. I will admit that is the sentiment of a great many people of the country, but we all know, of course, we can not legislate any power to any board or commission to fix the rates that will be imposed upon our imports.

I do not believe the time will ever come when the tariff will be out of American politics. It will never come, Mr. President, unless the people of the United States believe in protection the same as the people of Germany do to-day. I would advise my Democratic friends to reform as quickly as possible. They took the first step yesterday. I remember the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] stated that about the hardest pill he ever had to swallow was on his sixty-fourth birthday when he was compelled to vote for the provision in the pending bill imposing a tariff duty upon dyestuffs.

Mr. THOMAS. His sixty-second.

Mr. SMOOT. He said sixty-fourth, and he was corrected in the Democratic caucus by stating that it was only the sixty-second.

Mr. GALLINGER. Then, he has two years in which to repent before he reaches 64.

Mr. SMOOT. Or else abandon his position. Now, Mr. President, if we want to improve the system of tariff making, we can do it by having Congress appoint a body of practical men, not mere statisticians.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. SMOOT. I will yield in a moment; just as soon as I finish the sentence.

I say, Mr. President, that this question of rates of duty upon imports into our country is a business proposition, and that we must have practical business men, who know what effect the rates will have upon the business interests of the country. Now, I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. I suppose that the "practical men," whom the Senator from Utah would suggest, would be the managers or representatives of the gentlemen who run the big industries.

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, well, the Senator from Missouri supposes a good many things that are not true.

Mr. REED. So that the man who is to collect the tax would also have the pleasant privilege of writing the law specifying its amount. That is the way you used to write these bills; notably in the case of the American Woolen Manufacturers' Association, which sent its man North down here to prepare the woolen schedule. Is that the kind of "practical men" the Senator would suggest?

Mr. SMOOT. Well, this is about the tenth time I have heard the Senator from Missouri refer to Mr. North. Mr. President, the Senator from Utah, in what little experience he has had in helping to frame tariff legislation in the past, has always taken the position that wherever an industry in this country needs protection that that protection ought to measure the difference between the cost of making the goods in this country and in foreign countries; and I want it distinctly understood that that is all that I desire.

I also want it distinctly understood that whatever influence I may have toward securing tariff legislation by Congress will be used along that line. I say to the Senator from Missouri, that, no matter what rates have been heretofore written into Republican tariff acts, there has been secured at the same time prosperity to all of the people of the United States.

Mr. President, I had expected to speak but a few moments, and I shall close simply by saying that I shall vote for the amendment making this commission permanent, and I am going to vote for the increase of the salary of its members to $10,000 a year, for I believe the work of this commission will be more important than that of any commission which has heretofore been created by Congress.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHAFROTH in the chair). Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. GALLINGER. There seems to be an opinion, quite commonly held, that this proposed law does not make this commission permanent. The chairman of the Committee on Appropriations of the House, Mr. FITZGERALD of New York, had the word "permanent" stricken from the bill, and that created the impression that the commission was not to be permanent; but, as I read section 97, the commission is made permanent. The provision is very brief and I will read it. It provides:

> SEC. 97. That there is hereby appropriated, for the purpose of defraying the expense of the establishment and maintenance of the commission, including the payment of salaries herein authorized, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated the sum of $300,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and for each fiscal year thereafter a like sum is authorized to be appropriated.

Of course a future Congress can repeal that provision; but the terms of the bill itself, it seems to me, make the commission permanent.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator that the original House provision specifically provided for a permanent commission; but the word "permanent" was stricken out.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes; but section 97 was not stricken out.

Mr. SMOOT. No; but I will say to the Senator from New Hampshire that the life of the commission depends upon an appropriation being made each year. Therefore, I think it is not a permanent commission in the sense that other commissions, which have been created, are permanent.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I do not wish to take up the time of the Senate unnecessarily in the discussion of the reasons for the creation of a tariff board, nor do I care to take up the time of the Senate in discussing the attitude of the two parties in reference to this question in the past. I do wish to say, however, in passing, that since I have been a member of this body, and before the advent of the present administration, numerous bills were introduced in the Senate and numerous resolutions were offered in the Senate providing for the establishment of a permanent tariff commission; but none of those bills and none of those resolutions were enacted into law by the present minority party, which was then the majority party.

I recall very well when, I believe, we were discussing the Payne-Aldrich bill that the brilliant Senator from Indiana at that time, Mr. Beveridge, made a great fight here in behalf of a tariff commission—a comprehensive and permanent commission; but that effort of the then Senator from Indiana received very scant attention and very meager consideration from the other side of the Chamber. Notwithstanding his earnest efforts, Mr. President, aided by many other able Senators on both sides of the Chamber, the net outcome of it all was the authorization to the President to appoint, I think, two or three persons to aid him in applying the minimum and maximum provisions of the tariff law of 1909. Subsequently the authority of this temporary board, with limited powers, was somewhat enlarged, not by an enactment in the form of permanent law, however, but by a simple paragraph in an appropriation bill.

If the Republican Party while it was in power had been in favor of the creation of a tariff board, such as they now profess to favor, surely they did nothing to that end during the long years of their control of all branches of the Government, notwithstanding the advocacy and insistency of many earnest and sincere friends of an effective commission in both branches of Congress.

Mr. President, that much in passing. I do not understand why our friends upon the other side of the Chamber, in the vague manner of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], should attempt, in the face of the provisions of this bill, to produce the impression upon the country that in its attempt at creating this tribunal the Democratic Party have the purpose of making it a mere temporary commission. Not only here, but outside, an effort has been made to create that impression.

When this bill was first printed it contained a provision with reference to leasing or contracting for quarters for this commission. It contained a provision that they should not be authorized to make a lease of more than two years' duration. That was seized upon by certain newspapers sympathizing with the Republican Party and by certain Republican Senators to try to create the impression that there was a secret purpose on the part of the majority party to limit the life of this tribunal. As a matter of fact, Mr. President, the committee, in incorporating that provision in the bill, took no thought with reference to the life of the commission. It was a suggestion that grew entirely out of the fact that the committee thought it was unwise to authorize a long lease in view of the probability in a short time of securing suitable quarters in publicly owned buildings. We therefore put that provision in the bill because we believed that it was bad policy to lease for long periods buildings for governmental purposes. The committee desired to limit the time of the lease to as short a period as seemed to be practicable under the circumstances.

Mr. President, that is a mere incident, showing a disposition to try to create a false impression with reference to the purposes of the Democratic Party in creating this board. If there is any purpose on the part of anyone connected with the present administration or connected with the framing of this bill that this commission should be other than a permanent institution, it has never come to my knowledge; but, Mr. President, that question ought to be absolutely foreclosed by the provisions that are incorporated in the bill. If there ever was a piece of legislation that upon its face bore its purpose with respect to a particular thing, the provisions of this bill show a clear and unmistakable purpose on the part of its authors and its sponsors with reference to the permanency of this board.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. We make this service 12 years.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; in the very first section of that part of the bill which relates to the tariff commission we provide that—

> The first members appointed shall continue in office for terms of 2, 4, 6, 8, 10, and 12 years, respectively, from the date of the passage of this act, the term of each to be designated by the President. The President shall also designate biennially the chairman and vice chairman, but their successors shall be appointed for terms of 12 years.

Mr. President, not only that, not only is there a provision for the appointment of a commission the members of which are to be appointed for a term of 12 years, but in that very same section there is a provision that no member shall engage actively in any other business function or employment.

Senators say that we intend this to be a board with certain perfunctory duties with regard to getting up statistics and making such reports as clerks who are competent statisticians, but whose abilities and knowledge do not justify salaries in excess of $2,000 a year, could compile and make. Mr. President, that seems to me, in the face of the language contained in this bill, to be a very far-fetched conclusion. It is evident from the very language of the bill that the Democratic Party not only expects this board to be a permanent board, but expects it to be a board of great powers, of broad jurisdiction, and one that in the judgment of the Democratic Party will call for men of large ability, and that its work will be of such importance and of such volume that it is necessary that the men who are appointed on this board shall eschew absolutely while they are serving upon it all other occupations and give their whole time, attention, and abilities to the working out of the matters which are referred to them in this bill.

Now, why, in the light of these circumstances, should Senators impugn the motives of the dominant party simply because some members of that party have in the past held a different view from those they now profess with reference to a tariff commission? Let me call the attention of Senators on the other side of the Chamber to the fact that some members of their party in recent years have likewise held different views with reference to a tariff commission.

Senators say that the duties of this board are to be of a limited and circumscribed character. Why, Mr. President, if you will take the two sections conferring power upon and defining the scope of the work of the commission and put them side by side—they are separated in the bill—and give to the broad, general language used constructions that are generally placed upon general language in statutes and in laws, with the implied power that we always understand expressed powers to carry, I think you will find that the functions of this commission are exceedingly broad. I myself think it is very much better to describe these powers in general terms rather than in specific terms. If in writing a law conferring powers you can find suitable general terms, I think it is the experience of lawyers and of judges that it is preferable to do so rather than to be specific. That was the course pursued by our fathers when they adopted the Constitution of the United States. They did not particularize; they did not go into detail; they purposely used general terms, and thereby secured that elasticity which has made that great instrument adjustable to changing conditions and circumstances and enables the courts to give full efficacy to the implied powers conferred by the general language and adapt those powers to the requirements and the needs of the times.

As the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] has very justly said, the powers that are conferred in section 92, which seems to have escaped the attention of some Senators, very greatly broaden and enlarge the powers given in section 90. I want to read section 92:

That the commission shall have power to investigate the tariff relations between the United States and foreign countries—

That is a very broad phrase—"tariff relations." It embraces a great many things. It embraces most things that are connected with our trade relations with foreign countries—commercial treaties—

Our trade relations with foreign countries are in a very large measure defined and limited or enlarged by our commercial treaties. I believe we have some 20 or 30 such treaties, or we did have, defining our trade rights and exemptions in dealing with other countries. So that the two words "commercial treaties" in themselves embrace a volume; in fact, they embrace all things that are specified and agreed to in our numerous trade compacts with the other countries of the world.

Preferential provisions—

Mr. President, we understand what an important effect such provisions in the tariff laws of certain countries have upon our trade relations with those countries. We understand what an important effect the preferential rate given in the Canadian tariff to the British Government has upon our trade relations with Canada. We understand what an effect the preferential rates given by our treaty with Cuba has upon the trade relations of other countries with us and with Cuba. There we have again a broad term. I proceed—

The effect of export bounties and preferential transportation rates—

Those are things that very materially affect our trade relations with other countries. Germany, for a long time, Austria, and other countries in Europe granted export bounties to the producers of certain of their agricultural products which have affected the markets of the whole world with respect to such products.

The question of preferential transportation is also important. Only a few days ago some Senator in this Chamber referred pointedly and forcefully to the fact that Germany, as one means of combating world competition in world markets, had a provision by which exports from her borders were given preferential railroad rates from inland points to the seashore, thereby giving her people an advantage over other competitors in the markets of the world—a very important subject.

The volume of importations compared with domestic production and consumption—

"The volume of importations compared with domestic production and consumption" is a most fundamental factor, and one upon which, as I understand, the Senator from Alabama declared he based the application of the principle of a competitive tariff in the present law. In order that you may know what rates to fix in writing a competitive tariff, you want to know the importations into this country as compared with domestic production and consumption. That is provided for here.

Then, Mr. President, to further enlarge these broad grants of powers and jurisdiction, the section adds, in the nature of a summary—

And conditions, causes, and effects relating to competition of foreign industries with those of the United States, including dumping and cost of production

I undertake to say that no tariff-commission bill that has ever been written and proposed to the Senate or to either branch of Congress since I have been a Member of it has carried with it broader or more general powers than this bill carries. Some of them have specified more, some of them have particularized more, but none of them has conferred broader powers than these upon a tariff board.

Mr. President, some Senators have said that the proposed tariff commission has no power to and it is not required to submit reports. Why, Mr. President, it is specifically provided in the bill that they shall submit "reports of its investigations as hereinafter provided." How "hereinafter provided"? I read the provision from the bill:

SEC. 91. That the commission shall put at the disposal of the President of the United States, the Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives, and the Committee on Finance of the Senate, whenever requested, all information at its command, and shall make such investigations and reports as may be requested by the President or by either of said committees or by either branch of the Congress, and shall report to Congress on the first Monday of December of each year hereafter a statement of the methods adopted and all expenses incurred, and a summary of all reports made during the year.

Mr. President, I did not expect when I took the floor to consume the time that I have. I wanted only to make it clear that this is to be a permanent commission. The majority party has no other purpose. I wanted to make it clear that the powers of this commission are broad and will enable it, if it exercises them to the fullest extent, to investigate every important question in connection with our foreign trade relations and in connection with our imports and exports. I wanted also to make it clear that when these labors have been performed the result of their efforts and investigations will be at the command and service of the Congress; but I wanted more especially, Mr. President, to make it clear that the Democratic Party not only wanted a permanent institution but that it wanted men who were able to efficiently perform the duties of the position; and to that end they have provided that the men who are appointed on that board shall, for the time being and as long as they remain members of it, give up all other avocations in life and confine themselves solely and exclusively to the performance of the duties and functions of their office.

Mr. SIMMONS subsequently said: I ask unanimous consent to attach as a part of the remarks that I submitted with reference to the tariff commission a short time ago a statement of various and sundry bills that have been introduced in Congress during the last ten or dozen years proposing to create a tariff commission, and the fate of those bills.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection, consent will be granted.

The statement referred to is as follows:

ABORTIVE EFFORTS TO CREATE TARIFF BOARDS.

At the session December 4, 1904–March, 1905: In the House Mr. Spalding offered H. R. 15596 to provide for a tariff commission. Referred and not reported back.

There was also a House resolution, No. 380, to appoint a commission by the House

At the session December 4, 1905–June 30, 1906, there was H. Res. 523 to appoint a committee to investigate tariff schedules. No action.

At the session December 3, 1906–March 4, 1907: In the House Mr. STEENERSON (H. R. 2504), creating a tariff commission. Referred; no action.

By Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas, H. J. Res. 199, for the appointment of a tariff commission, providing for the appointment of the commission to inquire into relation of the tariff to trusts and monopolies and the industrial and labor interests of the United States, and to recommend such changes, if any, in the existing schedules as will better promote the common welfare. No action.

At the session December 21, 1907–May, 1908, in the Senate: Senator Beveridge offered S. 3163 to create a tariff commission. Senator LA FOLLETTE offered S. 6256 to create a tariff commission.

In the House: Mr. STEENERSON (H. R. 162) and Mr. MILLER (H. R. 13098), to create tariff commissions.

At the session December 7, 1908–March 4, 1909: Mr. Fowler offered two bills (H. R. 243 and H. R. 28050) to establish tariff commissions. Referred; no other action.

At the session of March 4, 1909–August 5, 1909, Mr. Fowler offered in the House H. R. 38 to provide for maximum and minimum tariff schedules and to establish a commission which shall investigate all duties on imports and fix the rates within said maximum and minimum tariff schedules, negotiate reciprocal treaties and recommend the adoption of the same, and collect such information with regard to products, manufactures, and commerce as will aid in the performance of its duties and promote and provide for the general welfare. No action.

By Mr. GARDNER, H. Res. 6517 to create a tariff commission.

In the Senate: Senator LA FOLLETTE offered S. 1747 to create a tariff commission.

Senator Beveridge offered S. 1820 and also S. 3095 to create a tariff commission. No action.

In the second section of the tariff bill of 1909 there was a provision "to secure information to assist the President in the discharge of the duties imposed upon him by this section and the officers of the Government in the administration of the customs laws, the President is hereby authorized to employ such persons as may be required," the duties referred to being to make treaties of reciprocity.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, the Senator from Utah is very greatly disturbed because the word "permanent" was stricken from the bill. If the word "permanent" were there, it should be stricken from the bill, because it is unnecessary. If the word "permanent" were there, it would be a very easy matter to make the board a temporary one by the denial of appropriations.

When the Federal Trade Commission bill was passed, we did not say it was to be permanent in character. When the Interstate Commerce Commission was created, the bill did not say it was to be permanent in character. When we created the United States Circuit Court of Appeals, we did not provide that it was to be permanent in character. When we create an additional United States district judge, we do not say the place is to be permanent in character, because so to designate it is unnecessary.

Mr. President, I have no doubt of the good faith of those who are responsible for this legislation. I have no doubt that they intended that this board should be permanent in character. I have been a believer in a tariff commission for long years; and if I may be permitted to be personal I may say that in an address before the joint session of the General Assembly of Ohio, after my election to the Senate, I then declared my faith in a tariff commission, and in the Sixty-second Congress I voted for a tariff commission.

I am one of those who believe that exact information on any subject is not going to hurt legislation. I care not whether we look at the subject from the standpoint of the high protectionist or from the viewpoint of the Democrat who believes in a revenue tariff. The difficulty on both sides of the Chamber is that we never have been exactly candid with one another when we discuss this subject.

If we look at it from the standpoint of the protectionist, it is necessary that we have this information. I remember, during the Sixty-second Congress, when we were discussing the reciprocity legislation, that a high protectionist, the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], proved, to his own satisfaction, that if that bill were to become a law it was going to destroy the wheat industry of the Dakotas, because the price of wheat north of the Canadian line was less than it was south of the Canadian line; and in the course of the same debate another high protectionist, the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND], proved that the price of wheat north of the Canadian line was as high, if not higher, than it was south of the Canadian line. The debate conclusively demonstrated that one or the other or perhaps both of these high protectionists were wrong in their figures.

On the other hand, if we look at it from the standpoint of the Democratic Party, there never has been a tariff bill enacted which was purely and simply a revenue bill. In the discussions which have taken place on the floor of the Senate and on the floor of the House the Republicans have said that they were opposed to a measure which had been proposed by the Democrats, because of its effect upon wage. The Democrats, on the other hand, have insisted upon their measure because, in their judgment, it would not interfere with the wages of the workingman. Truth compels the statement that there never has been any law fathered by the Republican Party, high though it may have been in protective character, that was not at the same time a revenue-producing bill; and equal candor suggests that there never has been a revenue measure proposed by the Democrats which was not pro tanto also protective in character, and often highly protective. For this reason why should any man say, "We do not care what the wage cost is or what the material cost is, we are going to frame a law without respect to the information and conclusions which we may draw from given established facts"?

So that I care not from what standpoint we approach tariff legislation, both sides of the Chamber, both schools of thought, will be benefited by having information which is reliable and which is exact.

Some Senators say: "We believe in protection. We must know the cost both of wage and of material." I have been interested to observe that most Senators are able to get statistics to prove anything they want, on any side of a question. I believe that if we have a permanent board composed of men who will use discretion, talent, and experience in the investigation of these subjects, they will be able to furnish data which will receive more credit from both sides of the Chamber than any that we have heretofore had.

Mr. President, it is said that the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce is already clothed with the power to collect this information, and that the Federal Trade Commission likewise has the power. I believe they both have; but, at the same time, it is my judgment that this subject is of such very grave importance that there ought to be a special commission whose sole duty it would be to study and investigate this subject.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. POMERENE. I do.

Mr. STERLING. If the Senator from Ohio will permit me, I should like to call his attention to the provision of the Federal Trade Commission law, under which I think the Federal Trade Commission has its only power in regard to the investigation of trade conditions abroad. This seems to be the provision:

To investigate, from time to time, trade conditions in and with foreign countries—

Now comes the limitation—

where associations, combinations, or practices of manufacturers, merchants, or traders, or other conditions, may affect the foreign trade of the United States, and to report to Congress thereon, with such recommendations as it deems advisable.

It would seem that their only power lies where there are "associations, combinations, or practices of manufacturers, merchants, or traders," and so forth, which call for such investigation.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I recognize that there may be room for honest difference of opinion as to the construction which should be given the language the Senator quotes; but I am not concerned about that. Whether the power exists there as broadly as we believe or not, the pending bill is broad enough; and whether the Federal Trade Commission has this power or not, surely the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce have it, and they have been acting upon it.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, will the Senator permit another question?

Mr. POMERENE. Yes.

Mr. STERLING. The Senator makes the statement that the pending bill is broad enough. Does the Senator believe that the pending bill is specific enough relative to the investigation of the question of cost of production at home and abroad?

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I do not know what definition the Senator intends to give to the word "specific." Its terms are general enough, and in that sense specific enough, to confer upon this board the widest power of investigation.

Mr. President, personally I do not believe in high salaries for Government officials. I do not believe that the salary attached to any official position should be the first desideratum of the officeholder. But we have heretofore, by other legislation, set a standard of compensation. It may be right, or it may be wrong. For myself, I attach just as much importance to this tariff commission as I do to any of the other commissions we have created. The functions which they will exercise are just as important, and if their work is well done it will be of just as much benefit to the public as the work which is to be performed by any other commission. For that reason I am disposed to think that the salaries should be increased to $10,000.

Mr. COLT. Mr. President, the question before the Senate is whether the salaries of the tariff commission should be $10,000 or $7,500. I am in favor of the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], making the salary $10,000, because of the importance of the duties which will fall to this commission, and for the further reason that I do not believe you can obtain men of the character and standing which would be necessary to fulfill these duties unless you pay a sufficiently high salary.

Mr. President, the question of protection has reached a new phase, depending upon new industrial and economic conditions.

That the question of protection has reached a new phase is plainly shown by the attitude of the Democratic Party in the provisions contained in this bill with respect to the duty upon dyestuffs and the appointment of a tariff commission. I maintain that the question of protection has changed fundamentally owing to changes in economic conditions. A nation is now obliged to adopt protection in self-defense in order to preserve its economic position. Why do I say this? I say it because free trade is based upon the fundamental proposition of fair and just competition, and if such competition does not exist among the great commercial nations there is no solution of the problem except through protection.

If Germany has adopted a system of organizing her industries into vast syndicates for the sole purpose of capturing foreign trade by dumping her products into the foreign market at any price which will effectually stifle foreign industries, there is no way of meeting that situation except by protection. If a nation ambitious to become a world power pursues the policy of obtaining control of the raw materials of the world and thereby monopolizes these materials and the industries dependent upon them, there is no way of meeting this situation except through a system of protection.

Mr. President, we have reached a new stage so far as the protective principle is concerned. Why, England has become a protectionist for self-preservation; and if England has become a protectionist by reason of the economic methods of Germany, and to some extent of other nations, how can we any longer defend the doctrine of a tariff for revenue only?

Therefore, the duties of this tariff commission, to my mind, are more important than the duties of any commission which has been appointed by this Congress. They have to investigate a question which vitally concerns the business interests of this country, which concerns in a larger point of view the national welfare and safety. When I look at the duties which this commission have to perform, when I see the matters which they are to investigate, I feel that no body of men in the country will be clothed with greater or higher responsibilities. We know the trade conditions which will confront us at the close of the war. We also know that we need all the light we can have upon the difficult and complex economic problems which will then present themselves, and we also know that we need men of the highest intelligence and business attainments to solve these problems.

Mr. President, $7,500 a year may appear to be a fair salary. It has always seemed to me that there was nothing upon which men honestly differ so much as the question of what is a proper salary. What is a proper salary depends a great deal upon circumstances. It might depend somewhat upon whether these commissioners lived in a large city like New York or Washington, or whether they lived in the country; it might depend upon whether or not they have large families. I know that you get the best work out of a man when he does not have to worry over the sufficiency of his salary. There is certainly a feeling of independence that a man possesses when his salary is more than adequate to meet all ordinary and reasonable expenses.

Mr. President, we must judge of things in the age in which we live, and not in the time of John Marshall. Probably the purchasing power of a dollar has declined several times since Marshall was Chief Justice of the United States. It has been said that in the time of Queen Elizabeth an English pound would purchase fourteen times what it will to-day. Men of the proper intelligence and standing to serve on a commission of this kind, especially if you select business men, undoubtedly would receive very much higher salaries in their business; and the same is true with regard to professional men.

Mr. President, this is not a case where we ought in the least to be governed by any narrow or prejudiced notions as to what is a proper salary. It is a great position. We should appoint men of the highest ability. They have to investigate the most important question now before the American people. If we should consult the public opinion of this country—and that ought to influence us—I believe that $10,000 is not an excessive salary for this commission.

For these reasons, I am in favor of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I do not intend to detain the Senate for more than a few minutes in discussing the Tariff Commission provision of the pending bill. I do not take it seriously I look on it merely as a catch phrase to take advantage of whatever popular sentiment there may be in favor of a real bona fide tariff commission to render this bill, carrying this burden of direct taxes upon the American people, more palatable, if it were possible to do so.

The Tariff Commission, as constituted in the bill, means nothing, as I view it. It is declared that such a tariff commission is proposed to carry out a pledge of the Democratic national convention at St. Louis on June 16, 1916. As is the case in nearly every other legislative or administrative act under the present administration, the necessity for it, and the utter change of attitude on the part of the majority, is blamed upon the requirements and the necessities of the war in Europe; and so we contemplate a tariff commission in the pending bill, the purpose of which, it is declared, is—

> To make an impartial and thorough study of every economic fact that may throw light either upon our past or upon our future fiscal policy.

Just what this means, Mr. President, is difficult to determine; but the framers of the bill are to be congratulated that they have omitted to embody in the paragraph the overridden, threadbare phrase "nonpartisan." There is no pretense that this commission shall be nonpartisan. There seems to be a suggestion that it shall be composed of members who have no preconceived ideas whatever about what might be the proper fiscal or economic policy of the United States.

As a matter of fact, Mr. President, I am one of those who believe that it will always be impossible to keep these questions outside of the realm of political discussion. I know that the average business man pictures in his mind a tariff commission which shall have the power of fixing rates, and so fixing them without the political discussion antecedent thereto in a presidential campaign or in the election of Members of Congress. But that thought on his part to my mind is an evanescent dream. It is impossible to take these great economic questions outside of the arena of political discussion. The Republican business man who pictures this blissful condition of fiscal and economic settlement takes it for granted that there shall be a protectionist commission, and that the members of the commission shall be prepared to impose upon imports adequate protective rates. The free trader and the importer picture a commission which will place the country largely upon a free-trade basis. When the question is brought up to them as to what would be the real result, there is not one of them who can fail to see at once that the picture which they have painted is impossible and, in my opinion, undesirable.

From the beginning of the history of the country down to the present time a large part of our political contests and controversies have had the question of free trade or protection as the leading and absorbing issue. In fact, this has been the case nearly always, except when some matter of an acute character arose, such as the controversy over slavery in the ante bellum days, but always the pendulum has swung back and the tariff has appeared upon the scene.

This question has been preeminently paramount in the American Republic, largely due to our Federal system, which was presumed to apply itself first to the resources of the customhouse for raising of revenue for the expenses of the Nation, but the same contests have been waged in other countries, varying from generation to generation as the economic needs of any particular country brought about a change. England at one time was the most highly protected nation in the world, and its merchant marine was entirely built up by the most oppressive system of navigation laws that was ever devised by human ingenuity; but when the time came that England had an altered position in the affairs of the world and had outstripped other nations by reason of the inventions of a line of brilliant inventors in the textile and other manufacturing industries and no longer required her navigation laws, then she changed, after a long and strenuous political discussion, her protection notions and became a free-trade country, and so continued for a period of some 100 years, until to-day, as the result of the conditions brought about by the war in Europe she is coming around again to a condition of protection and to an advocacy of all kinds of restriction upon merchant marine and trade, calculated for their further protection, equal in their drastic character to any that was proposed prior to the wars in Europe in the first quarter of the last century. So while these economic discussions are perhaps more prominent in our Federal Union than they are abroad it is only a difference in degree. They must always be a matter of discussion before the people, and the verdict must lie with the popular decisions upon these questions.

How a nonpartisan tariff board can adjust the differences between a free-trade Democrat and a protectionist Republican has always been a difficult problem for me to solve. There is no guiding suggestion laid down in the present provision regarding a tariff commission. I would have added to the paragraph that it should be the principal duty of the commission to investigate the difference in wages and labor conditions between here and abroad, but this important element in the welfare of our people apparently has not been considered in any way as a part of the purpose of the tariff commission. If the nonpartisan character of the commission is to be put in evidence by the appointment of Republicans such as have been generally selected by the present administration for nonpartisan boards, the Republican Party will not get very much consolation out of the kind of protectionist Republicans that are likely to be selected.

We have only to examine the debates in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD up until this session of Congress to realize the fact that the Democrats in the House and Senate have been unanimously opposed to a tariff commission.

The subject has been treated with sneers, with contempt, and with ridicule. I do not recall a case where it has found favor on the Democratic side, either in the Senate or in the House of Representatives, so far as we can learn from the spoken words of Democrats in either branch of Congress.

A tariff commission is doubtless well enough to collect data and furnish information and even to suggest rates, but the value of this information and these suggestions will depend entirely upon the point of view. If the point of view is that of an ad valorem low-duty direct-tax Democrat, it will hardly receive acceptance should the Republicans be in control of the Congress; and in the same way if the recommendation comes from a board having the point of view of specific duties and adequate protective duties, we have only to recall the fate of the wool schedule and the recommendation of the tariff commission under President Taft to know what indifferent treatment a nonpartisan tariff commission report receives from a party in power of opposite view regarding fiscal legislation. There never was a more voluminous or illuminating report than that made by the last tariff commission upon the wool schedule. The field was exhausted; many thousand dollars were spent in gathering the information; the recommendations regarding differences in costs and differences in industrial conditions were full and exhaustive. And yet the Democratic Party had determined on free wool, and having gone so far during the campaign in proclaiming their intention to have free wool that they could not have avoided to reverse themselves, even had they been convinced and persuaded to the contrary, the Democratic majority in Congress completely ignored the report of the tariff commission and put wool on the free list; and I regret to say that even on the Republican side it seemed impossible to get unanimity upon a wool schedule, notwithstanding the elaborate report of the tariff commission upon wool, available for every Member of the Senate and the House.

I say it with all due respect to my colleagues on this side of the Chamber, but the fact remains and will be recalled by those who were in the last and in the Congress preceding that several bills relating to the wool schedule were introduced on the Republican side in the Senate, and several were also introduced in the House of Representatives by Republicans, differing materially in most essential details and all claiming to be based on the report of the Taft Commission upon the wool schedule.

As I recall it, the senior Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] and the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] had a bill, and I had a bill. The Representative from Connecticut [Mr. HILL], I believe, had a bill; and there were several other bills. Many of these bills the manufacturers of New England and Pennsylvania informed me would be absolutely useless as practical measures and they would rather have the original Underwood bill passed than have several of them which they specified enacted into law. Yet all of them were introduced by Republicans and were urged as being based upon the findings of the Taft Tariff Commission upon schedule K.

So that after all, while a tariff commission may be useful, just as the reports of the consular agents are useful and the statistics of the Treasury experts are useful, yet anyone who persuades himself that their report can ever be conclusive or relieve Congress of the ultimate responsibility of solving the problem, in my opinion, fails to appreciate the lessons in the recent past.

It is nothing new to state that the President has vacillated and changed his mind on this question, as he has on numerous other questions, since he was an author of books of history and political discussion, or even since he has occupied the high office which he now holds. In his address at Indianapolis he said what I will ask the Secretary to read from Mr. Wilson's address.

The Secretary read as follows:

> But if by scientific treatment of the tariff they mean adjustment to the actual trade conditions of America and the world, then I am with them, and I want to call their attention, for though they voted for it they apparently have not noticed it, to the fact that the bill which creates the new trade commission does that very thing. We were at pains to see that it was put in there. That commission is authorized and empowered to inquire into and report to Congress not only upon all the conditions of trade in this country, but upon the conditions of trade, the cost of manufacture, the cost of transportation—all the things that enter into the question of the tariff—in foreign countries as well as in the United States, and into all those questions of foreign combinations which affect international trade between Europe and the United States. It has the full powers which will guide Congress in the scientific treatment of questions of international trade. Being by profession a schoolmaster, I am glad to point that out to the class of uninstructed Republicans, though I have not always taught in the primary grade.

Mr. PENROSE. My experience is that when you get into the practical affairs of life you have to unlearn a great deal that is taught by the schoolmaster.

Just what is meant by a trade commission, with power to bring about an adjustment to the actual trade conditions of America and the world, I am at a loss to understand. The language partakes of that rhetorical vagueness too often characteristic of similar utterances.

Later on, however, the President shows his conversion to the tariff-commission proposition in his letters to the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives. In that connection he declares in favor of—> some such instrumentality as would be supplied by a tariff board.

And he further declares that the board should be—> free from any strong prepossession in favor of any political policy, and capable of looking at the whole economic situation of the country with a dispassionate and disinterested scrutiny.

And follows with a number of general statements calculated to impress anyone having practical experience with matters of legislation that the kind of tariff board he intended to describe would be of about as useless and impracticable a character as is well possible for any board or commission to be.

The tariff-commission paragraph in the pending bill is not of any very great importance. It apparently is put in merely as a measure to attract and mislead Republicans. In fact, there has been a propaganda conducted throughout the country in favor of a tariff commission. This provision in the pending bill supplies a popular catchword which is meaningless and ineffective in this connection. Should the Republicans be restored to power, they will doubtless provide for a tariff commission which will produce practical and effective results in the direction of reasonable and adequate protective rates, based upon a thorough examination of the difference in cost here and abroad.

Not only was the present Trade Commission supposed to be an agency to investigate the tariff question, but when the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce was created by the consolidation of the Bureau of Foreign Commerce of the State Department and the Bureau of Statistics of the Department of Commerce and Labor, a weapon was thought to have been thus created by the Democrats with which to investigate business men who claimed that a Democratic tariff injured their business. Mr. UNDERWOOD on May 8, 1913, stated in the House:

> We have established a Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce * * * when a great manufacturing institution is ready to frighten its laborers with a reduction of wages because they say there has been adverse action and legislation in Congress * * * that bureau has the power to walk into their offices and ascertain whether there is real reason for their cutting the wages of their labor or whether it is merely a selfish attempt to put money into their own pockets.

A few days before this statement the chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee also declared—

> This House within a year has created the machinery of government by which the President of the United States can ascertain the facts desired and through that medium already established can give the Congress not only the information that we call for in this bill but can give Congress the information called for in the Tariff Board amendment. The Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce was builded for that purpose.

Both the Trade Commission and the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce have failed as agencies for tariff investigation.

And now we have the proposal of a commission which will necessarily prove to be more ineffective and useless than either the other two boards, because this proposed tariff commission is provided for on lines almost identical with the provisions of the law providing for the two bureaus to which I have referred. I have said that the bureaus already authorized have failed in their purpose as far as tariff investigations are concerned. Perhaps I am wrong.

I have here the report on trade and tariff in Brazil, Uruguay, Argentina, Chile, Bolivia, and Peru, published by the Federal Trade Commission, issued as late as June 30, 1916. I have no doubt this is a very elaborate, illuminating, and interesting report. What tariff commission upon any line suggested in the pending revenue bill can do any more than duplicate the work which it is evident from this report the Federal Trade Commission is already performing?

The only service is, as I have said, to afford a catch phrase in the bill to make, perhaps, a certain number of Republicans in the country think that something has been down toward the creation of an effective tariff commission upon protective lines.

I do not intend to pursue this matter further. I do not want to be supposed to be in opposition to a proper tariff commission, and an effective one. I would be foolish to array myself in opposition to any agency which can collect information for both branches of Congress when every five or six or eight or ten years this tariff question comes up requiring the adjustment of our tariff schedules to the changing needs of the country.

I feel that we already have many agencies collecting this information for the benefit of Congress. We have the reports of our consular agents all over the world, the reports of the Treasury Department through its various bureaus and agencies, the reports of the Department of Commerce through its bureaus and agencies, and the elaborate hearings which are always held when tariff measures are up particularly by the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives.

I am not one of those, Mr. President, who belittle or underrate the value of the information and the hearings furnished by the business men and the manufacturers of America when a tariff bill is under consideration. I can only recall the methods of the German Government in framing tariff laws when the business men of Germany are taken by their Government officials into their full confidence and cooperation, and with their help the tariff laws are framed for the German Empire, which have resulted, in my opinion, in enabling Germany to stand self-sustaining, cut off from the rest of the world, in this the greatest war of our history. And I also welcome at such hearings and conferences the wage earners and workers of the land interested in upholding the high standard of American wages.

Had Germany ignored the information and advice of the business men, had she not protected the products of her farms and mills, surrounded and confined as she is by hostile forces cutting her off from supplies from everywhere else, she would long ago have been obliged to succumb to the forces which are opposing her.

In concluding, however, Mr. President, I wish to call attention to a brief extract from a speech delivered in Congress by William McKinley in reference to a tariff commission. Before I ask the Secretary to read it I will say in conclusion that I shall advocate an amendment to this paragraph instructing the commission to investigate the differences in wages and cost of production here and abroad, and that I shall at all times support a tariff commission proposed for a bona fide purpose and with a sincere intention; but this commission to me is meaningless; it is simply a duplication of two other commissions for which large appropriations have been allowed, and has no other purpose, in my opinion, than to mislead the people of the country when they come to visit their condemnation upon this monstrous measure of direct taxation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

I can not refrain from saying that we are taking a new and somewhat hazardous step in delegating a duty that we ought ourselves to perform—a duty confided to us by the Constitution, and to no others. It is true that a commission does not legislate, and therefore its work may or may not be adopted by Congress. This is the safety of the proposition. The information it will furnish will be important, and its statistics of rare value, but the same sources of information are open to Congress and to the Committee on Ways and Means as will be available to a commission; and as the former will ultimately have to deal with the question practically in Congress, it has seemed to me if that committee were willing to undertake the task, and had the requisite time to perform it, it would be the wisest and most certain course to the accomplishment of results desired by all. Certainty and stability are essential elements to the success of trade, and as long as we are doing reasonably well experiments should be avoided.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, the Republican Party to-day, as in the past, is the special representative in legislation and in Government of the so-called interests. The disaster which that party suffered in the election of 1912 has not weaned it from this odious copartnership. Events now transpiring make it clear that if that party is restored to power this old copartnership will not only continue, but the alliance will be even more strongly knit together than in the past.

Out of this alliance sprung what came to be known throughout the country as the invisible government.

These interests wrote our tariff laws; they wrote our financial laws and controlled our financial policies. The Republican Party could deny them nothing which they demanded and could do nothing which they opposed. Our legislation became a system of special privileges and governmental favors to these privileged classes. They demanded that they be protected from competition from abroad and that they be permitted to protect themselves against competition at home, and it was granted. At their dictation a financial system had been built up which placed the money of the country in the hands of a few great financiers, who made money plentiful or scarce as their selfish interests required. The people's interest was forgotten or considered of minor or secondary importance.

When this exploitation of the people through the agency of the Republican Party had reached a point where it became unbearable the protest against that party became so strong that its candidate for President in 1912 carried only two small States in the Union, and a Democratic President and Congress were elected upon the promise to put an end to these outrageous abuses and usurpations and to reestablish government by the people and for the people.

The Democratic Party in response to this demand of the people has put an end to these shameful, scandalous prostitutions of governmental functions. The special interests no longer control at the White House or in the Halls of Congress. They no longer dictate and control our economic, fiscal, and commercial policies. Their special privileges have been taken away from them, and in truth and in fact the rule of the people has been restored.

But for the power and influence and almost exhaustless resources of these great special interests which the Democratic Party in 1912 unhorsed and have since stripped of their privileges, the crushing defeat then administered to the Republican Party would have eliminated it as a factor in the coming election, and the contest this year would be between the Democratic and Progressive Parties. But these powerful interests, with exhaustless resources, ready to dare and do everything, have in a last desperate effort to regain the scepter then wrested from their hands again rallied around the old guard of that party as their only hope, and have enabled the stand-pat and reactionary wing of that party to capture the Progressive wing, and the old fight between government by the few in the interest of the classes and the special interests and government by the people in the interest of the people is again on, and it goes without saying that these interests will fight with the desperation of a monarch who has lost his throne and thinks he sees a last desperate chance to win it back. They fight not for a throne but what to them means more than a throne—the privilege of exploiting at will 100,000,000 people for their selfish ambitions and greed. Their plethoric pocketbooks are wide open to regain these lost privileges, and it is for the purpose of making the purchase safe that the Republicans in Congress have announced their determination and purpose to defeat the corrupt practices act, thereby giving them a free hand in their effort to buy the election and again install themselves in their old position of dictation at the White House and in Congress.

There can be no concealment of the fact that the Republican Party as organized and controlled to-day is more thoroughly representative of the special interests and if again placed in power would be more thoroughly under the control of those interests than in the days of Aldrich and CANNON. The men who control that party to-day in Congress and in the country, the men who controlled and brought about the nomination of the Republican candidate for the Presidency, are as close to the special interests, as representative of those interests, and as sympathetic with their demands as were the men who controlled the policies of that party during the Taft and Roosevelt administrations, when special privilege and monopoly were more rampant and dominant in this country than in any period of our history.

Only a few days ago the Senate heard with amazement the bold declaration of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], one of the strongest and most ardent champions of special privilege and governmental favoritism through legislation in the Republican Party, criticizing the so-called concessions of the Payne-Aldrich Tariff Act, and impliedly, almost directly, attributing the misfortunes of the Republican Party to what he declared to be the fact that in an unguarded moment it had yielded to the uninformed demand of the people and permitted reductions from the Dingley tariff rates. Evidently that Senator, filled with the reactionary spirit to which I have referred as dominant in the minds of the element now in control of the Republican Party, believes if that party is restored to power it should enact a tariff law more radically protective and favorable to the special interests than either the Payne-Aldrich or the Dingley tariffs. I commend this part of the speech of the Senator from New Hampshire to those Progressives who are considering supporting the Republican Party in this campaign.

I am not surprised that the special interests do not like our Democratic tariff. They did not write it, not because they did not want to write it, but because we would not let them write it. When we were making it they came to Washington in full force with their experts and their attorneys, as in the old days of Republican tariff making, to tell us how to write it. We treated them courteously and kindly, but when it came to writing the bill we let them understand that that was our job, and that we were the representatives of the people and not of their tariff overlords, and as such we proposed to make the bill in their interests and not in the interest of their taskmasters.

These same interests, through representatives in Congress and outside, say it is the worst tariff law ever written. Undoubtedly it is the worst ever written for the trusts, the monopolists, and tariff grabbers, but I am sure it is the best ever written for the people who bear the burdens and pay the taxes.

They complain that our tariff has made the tariff wall so low that the foreigner can climb over it. That is just what we intended to do.

You can revise the tariff downward without hurting the special interests if you keep the wall high enough to keep the foreigner out. That was what the Payne-Aldrich law did in many instances. But you can not revise the tariff in the interest of the people unless you lower the wall enough to let the foreigner over and allow some competition from abroad, especially when the price here is above the level of a fair and just profit. That is what we aimed to do when we wrote the present law, and that is what I think we did do. If any are dissatisfied, it is because they are not content with fair prices and reasonable profits. If any suffer, it is because we have taken their business from a monopolistic basis and put it upon a fairly competitive basis.

Now, let us consider the charges made by the Republicans against the actual operations of the present tariff. While claiming that the tariff has had nothing to do with the overflowing prosperity we are now enjoying, they charge that before the war the Democratic tariff had flooded the country with cheap foreign goods, reduced our sales abroad, brought disaster to business, and proved a failure as a revenue producer.

Mr. President, in passing I can not refrain from referring to the great embarrassment—yea, distress—of our Republican friends because of the prosperity the people are to-day enjoying under Democratic administration. Its effect upon their mental attitude is painful to behold. They have brooded over it until they seem to have developed a positive antipathy to prosperity. They snarl at it, turn up their noses at it, and even question whether it is not an unwholesome and sinister sort of thing thrust upon us by evil portents. They leave the impression that it would be intolerable to them but for the hope that it may soon disappear.

Now and then under Republican administrations we had some prosperity, never permanent—subject always to such disastrous panics as we had in 1907 on account of the makeshift financial system of that party. But such prosperity as we had—vacillating and uncertain as it was—when that party was in power they attributed always to the tariff and the Republican Party. They would not admit that those spurts of prosperity were due in any way to any conditions except the legislation and policies of that party. If crops were bountiful here and short elsewhere, they would not admit that those conditions had anything to do with the greater prosperity which resulted. This prosperity was altogether a Republican product, dependent in no way upon the fundamental laws of supply and demand, dependent in no way upon conditions affecting production here and elsewhere—a thing with which the people had nothing to do except to enjoy, a blessing having its source and center solely in Republican legislation.

Now that we are enjoying a prosperity incomparably greater—a prosperity more thoroughly diffused than ever before—a prosperity which has placed us in the forefront of the nations of the world they ridicule it, deny that legislation or good government has anything to do with it, and proclaim it a thing which has been forced upon us and that will disappear as suddenly as it came and leave wreck and ruin behind it.

But this aside, let us examine their several criticisms of the actual operations of the Democratic tariff and revenue system before the war, in their order.

FIRST CHARGE.

The first charge they make against the Democratic tariff law is that it had proved a failure before the war in that it did not produce adequate revenue to run the Government. This charge is without foundation and is false as a statement of fact.

This is not a matter of argument or conjecture; it is a matter of record—a question to be determined by the facts, and the facts are facts of record and can not be disputed except by a willful perversion of the record.

What is that record? The record fact is that during the first year of the life of the present tariff act the receipts of the Treasury were the largest up to that time in all our history—$10,500,000 larger than in the previous year under the Payne-Aldrich Act; they were not only sufficient to pay the expenses of the Government, but left in the Treasury enough to pay the expenses of that year's construction work of the Panama Canal.

This statement is not only true with respect to the first fiscal year of the present administration, but it is equally true with respect to that part of that fiscal year which elapsed after the present tariff law went into effect. From January 1, 1914, to August 1, 1914, being that part of the year immediately preceding the war, when the present act was in full force, the ordinary receipts of the Treasury under the present law were $27,000,000 greater than those from January 1, 1913, to August 1, 1913. So that whether we take the whole fiscal year immediately before the war or the seven months when the present law was in full force, the revenues of the Government during this period were greater than during the like period of the preceding year, when the Payne-Aldrich Act was in force.

Instead of our tariff law being a failure as a revenue producer during the period of its operation before the war the books of the Treasury will show that during the first fiscal year under it the receipts of the Treasury were greater than in any previous year of all our history—greater than in any year under the McKinley tariff; greater than in any year under the Dingley tariff; greater than in any year under the Payne-Aldrich tariff; greater than under any revenue system ever enacted in our whole history; greater by $13,000,000 than I estimated when I reported the bill to the Senate; and after paying all expenses there was a surplus in the Treasury. And we did not have to sell any bonds either, while under the Dingley and Payne-Aldrich Acts on four different occasions during the administrations of Roosevelt and Taft it was found expedient to reimburse the Treasury by the sale of bonds.

Ordinary receipts of the Government (exclusive of postal).

Fiscal year.	Receipts.	Increase.	Decrease.
1911	$701,372,000
1912	691,778,000		$9,594,000
1913	724,111,000	$32,333,000
1914	734,673,000	10,562,000
Jan. 1 to Aug. 1:
1913	429,558,000
1914	456,728,000	27,170,000

We not only had a surplus in the Treasury on the 1st day of July, 1914, being the end of the first fiscal year under the present administration, but on August 1, 1914, we had a balance in the general fund in the Treasury of $158,384,000, being $20,000,000 more than on the 1st day of August during any year of the Payne-Aldrich bill.

In a colloquy between Senators GRONNA, WEEKS, SMOOT, and myself on August 25, in which we were discussing the question of how the Republicans proposed to raise the three hundred and sixty-odd million dollars in addition to the current expenses for preparedness, the Senator from Massachusetts, Senator WEEKS, stated "that if the lowest Payne-Aldrich rate was now in force, based on our present importations, there would be an added revenue of $176,000,000 per year." The lowest Payne-Aldrich ad valorem rate was 17.69 per cent in 1913.

The Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] stated that the average ad valorem rate of the Payne-Aldrich law was 18.8 per cent and if the importations were the same during the fiscal year 1917 as they were in 1916 there would be a gain of $183,000,000 in customs receipts.

This result was obtained by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] by applying the lowest Payne-Aldrich ad valorem rate, which was 17.69 per cent, and the result was obtained by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], as he stated on the floor, by applying the average ad valorem rate under the Payne-Aldrich bill, which was 18.8 per cent, to the actual imports for the fiscal year 1916.

The fallacy of this method of calculation would seem to be too apparent to require any consideration. The ad valorem rate of the same tariff law varies from year to year, according as the character and price of the imports change. There was no year during the Dingley law, as there was no year under the Payne-Aldrich law and as there has been no year under the present law, when the average ad valorem on imports was the same.

During each of these three periods when these fluctuations in the average ad valorem rates under each of these several acts were going on the tariff rates were the same.

I hereto attach a table taken from the Statistical Abstract for 1915, page 497, giving the average ad valorem rate for each year from 1898 to 1916, inclusive.

Total imports of United States for consumption.
[Statistical Abstract, 1915, p. 479.]

Dingley law.		Payne-Aldrich law.		Underwood-Simmons law.
Fiscal year.	Average ad valorem.	Fiscal year.	Average ad valorem.	Fiscal year.	Average ad valorem.
	Per cent.		Per cent.		Per cent.
1898	24.77	1910	21.11	1914	14.88
1899	29.48	1911	20.29	1915	12.49
1900	27.62	1912	18.58	1916	9.72
1908	23.88	1913	17.69
1909	22.99

It will be seen from this table that the average ad valorem under the Dingley law fell from 29.48 per cent for 1899 (the first full year under that law) to 22.99 per cent for 1909 (the last full year), a decrease of over 22 per cent for the 10 years, or an average of over 2 per cent per year.

The average ad valorem under the Payne-Aldrich law fell from 21.11 per cent for 1910 to 17.69 per cent for 1913, a decrease of about 16 per cent for three years, or an average of 5½ per cent per year.

The average ad valorem under the present law fell from 12.49 per cent for the first full year of that law (1915) to 9.72 per cent for 1916, a decrease of 22 per cent.

The steady decrease from 1899 to 1913 was due principally to the steady increase in prices, an increase which still continues, and which has been very much greater since the beginning of the war than at any time before.

The decrease from 1909 to 1913 was caused by the steady increase in prices, together with the practical prohibition of many of the rates of the Payne-Aldrich law. This explains the more than doubling of the annual rate of decrease.

The decrease from 1914 to 1916 was caused by the lower rates of the present law, aided by the change in the character of our imports and large increase in price due to abnormal conditions.

To plainly see the effect on the ad valorem rate of duty of the increase in price and also of the increase in the total value of imports, while the amount imported changes very little, let us look at our sugar trade for the past few years.

Sugar—Illustration of effect of increase in price on ad valorem rate.

Year.	Imports.		Average price (cents per pound).	Estimated duty collected on total imports.
	Quantity.	Value.		Amount.	Ad valorem rate.
	Pounds.				P. ct.
1914	5,066,821,873	$101,649,375	2.09	$62,000,000	61
1915	5,420,981,867	173,992,603	3.21	54,000,000	31
1916	5,633,161,749	208,769,399	3.71	56,000,000	27

This shows that the importations increased from 1914 to 1916 about 11 per cent, while the price increased over 85 per cent and the ad valorem decreased over 55 per cent.

The specific rate for the last three months of 1914 and for the years 1915 and 1916 was the same—a reduction from the Payne-Aldrich rate of about 25 per cent. The quantity imported for 1914, 1915, and 1916 was practically the same, but the equivalent ad valorem rate of duty was cut in half.

It is said that the average Payne-Aldrich rate was 18.8 per cent. It will also be seen that the average rate under the present law is 12.35. It is evident that it would be absurd to apply either of these rates to the actual imports of 1916, as is shown by the fact that the rate of the present tariff applied to the actual imports of 1916 gives an ad valorem widely different from the ad valorem of either of the two previous years.

The question therefore is, What would be the average actual ad valorem on imports for the fiscal year 1917 if the Payne-Aldrich rates were applied? It is not a question of applying the ad valorems of any other years, but a question of applying fixed rates to actual imports.

I have requested the Treasury Department to furnish me, if possible, with a fair and reasonable basis for applying the Payne-Aldrich rates to actual imports for the year 1916.

At the request of the Secretary of the Treasury, this statement has been prepared for me by Mr. McCoy, the Actuary of the Treasury Department, and Mr. Nevius, chief statistician of the Customs Division of that department, working in concert. They have given me two bases of calculation. The statement furnished by Messrs McCoy and Nevius is as follows:

CUSTOMS REVENUE FOR 1916 UNDER PAYNE-ALDRICH RATES.

The war has very much curtailed the European manufactures of the highly dutiable goods formerly sent to this country. It has also caused a great increase in prices, thus reducing the ad valorem rate of duty equivalent to the specific rates imposed by our tariff law. This, together with a large increase in our import of crude articles, has much reduced the average ad valorem rate of duty upon our total imports.

In order to find this effect upon the average rate of ad valorem duty under the present law, we assume as the normal the average rate for the fiscal year 1914 (14.88 per cent) and 1915 (12.49 per cent), which is—per cent—	13.69
Average rate fiscal year 1916—do—	9.72
A decrease in ad valorem of—do—	3.97

This 3.97 per cent ad valorem is 29 per cent of the normal 13.69 per cent.

Payne-Aldrich rate, ad valorem, fiscal year 1913, per cent	17.69
This reduced by the 29 per cent above shown—per cent—	5.13
This leaves as the estimated Payne-Aldrich rate for 1916—per cent—	12.56
Total importation of all goods, fiscal year 1916	$2,197,900,000
This multiplied by the average rate as above—per cent—	12.56
Customs revenue for 1916 under Payne-Aldrich rate	$276,056,000
Actual customs revenue, 1916, under present law	211,866,000
Additional revenue under Payne-Aldrich rates—	64,190,000

The Department of Commerce, in Senate Document No. 336, first session Sixty-fourth Congress, has carefully worked out the following ad valorem rates:

Average ad valorem rates on total imports of the United States for nine months' periods, exclusive of wool and manufactures of wool for the first three months and of sugar and molasses for the first six months in both cases.

October 1, 1912, to June 30, 1913—per cent—	15.45
October 1, 1913, to June 30, 1914—do—	12.30
Abnormal conditions have resulted in the ad valorem rate of duty on total imports for 1916 being reduced to—per cent—	9.72
A reduction from—do—	12.30
Of—do—	2.58

2.58 per cent ad valorem is 21 per cent of 12.30 per cent ad valorem.

Payne-Aldrich rate, as shown above—per cent—	15.45
Reduce this by 21 per cent, as above shown—do—	3.24
This leaves as the estimated Payne-Aldrich rate for 1916—per cent—	12.21
Total imports for 1916	$2,197,900,000
This multiplied by the average rate—per cent—	12.21
Gives customs revenue for 1916 under Payne-Aldrich rates	$268,364,000
Actual customs revenue for 1916 under present law—	211,866,000
Decrease in revenue under present law—	56,498,000

It will be seen by both of these tests, if the Payne-Aldrich rates were applied to the importations of 1916 the increase in customs revenues would be only $56,498,000, which is $126,500,000 less than the statement made by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] and $119,500,000 less than the statement made by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS].

This shows that if the Payne-Aldrich rates were applied to the importations of 1916 the increased revenue would be less than the receipts from personal income taxes for the year 1916 and much less than the receipts from the income tax imposed under the pending bill, and would leave over $300,000,000 of the cost of preparedness unprovided for.

The fact that our customs revenues have not in recent months increased proportionately with our imports is used as an argument against the revenue-producing qualities of the Democratic tariff. The answer is simple and conclusive.

The revenue derived from imports depends upon their character and the war has radically changed the character of our imports.

Our dutiable imports have greatly decreased since the war. Our dutiable imports from Europe, from whence in normal times we derive two-thirds of our total dutiable imports, decreased 32 per cent in 1915 and from the balance of the world something over 6 per cent. This fact fully accounts for the continued shortage in customs revenues. But while our dutiable imports have greatly decreased, as a result of the war, our free imports, especially from nonmanufacturing countries, have increased; first, because since the war we have taken the place of Europe in supplying these countries with their manufactures, and have had, as a matter of course, to take their crude products in payment. Secondly, because the enormous foreign demand for our products during the past 12 or 18 months has made it necessary for us to increase our purchases of raw materials—some of which we do not produce at all—from abroad.

SECOND CHARGE.

Secondly, it is charged that before the war, under the present tariff act, the country was flooded with cheap foreign goods. This charge is not true, as the record will show, either as to free or dutiable imports prior to the war. There was, as I have stated, a falling off in our dutiable imports and the increase in our free imports was not abnormal.

The Republican tariff, as does our tariff, carried a big free list. Most of the things on the Republican free list were for the benefit of the manufacturer—free raw materials for use in his manufactures. When we came to write the tariff we added somewhat to the Republican free list, but while some of the things we added were for the benefit of the manufacturer, most of them were for the benefit of the people—things that without further manipulation go directly into consumption by the people—but the ratio of increase in our free imports under the Democratic tariff up to the time of the beginning of the war and until the enormous demand upon our factories, mines, and fields to supply the requirements of our great export trade made it necessary for our manufacturers to increase their purchases of free raw materials from abroad was no greater than under the Payne-Aldrich Act.

In reply to this charge I again appeal to the record. It will show that our imports of dutiable goods for the fiscal year 1914 fell off $59,000,000 and that our general imports of goods free of duty that year increased $140,000,000, making a total increase in general imports of that year of $81,000,000.

This is the record of the increase in general imports under the present law during the first year before the war. It is a normal increase. It is very much less than was estimated at the time the tariff bill of 1913 was reported to the Senate by the Committee on Finance, as will be shown by reference to my report filed for the committee on that bill.

This increase of $81,000,000 in our general imports during the first year of that law is now held up to the country by Republican politicians as showing that this law and its operation before the war was a menace to our industries and a voluntary turning over of the American market to the foreigner. How utterly absurd this charge is and how completely the Republicans are estopped from making such an argument will appear when the increase in our imports for the year 1914—the first year of the present tariff law—is compared with the increase in our imports during the first year of the Payne-Aldrich law which it supplanted. I have the record showing that increase.

If you will turn to the Monthly Summary of Foreign Commerce, June, 1916, page 57, you will be amazed to find, in view of this Republican charge against the present law, that during the year 1910—the first fiscal year of the Payne-Aldrich Act—there was an increase in our general imports over the previous year of $245,000,000, the increase being three times as great as that during the first year of the present law.

But let us bring these periods of comparison nearer together. Instead of taking the first year under each of these laws let us take the last year under the Payne-Aldrich law and the first year under the Democratic law. What is the result?

A reference to the volume to which I have just called attention will show that during the last year under the Payne-Aldrich Act the increase in general imports was $160,000,000 as against $81,000,000 during the first year under the present law, or twice as great as under the present law.

The table which I hereto attach from the Monthly Summary for June, 1916, not only sustains these statements, but in addition it shows that the increase in general imports under the Payne-Aldrich law during its whole life was $502,000,000, or an annual average increase of $125,000,000, while the increase in general imports under the present law for the first three fiscal years of its life was $385,000,000, or a yearly average of $128,000,000.

In other words, the total average annual increase of imports under the present law over the Payne-Aldrich law has amounted to only $3,000,000.

General imports—Monthly summary of commerce, June, 1916.

Tariff law.	Year	Total imports.
Dingley	1909	$1,236,927,000
Payne-Aldrich	1910	1,556,947,000
Do	1911	1,527,223,000
Do	1912	1,653,265,000
Do	1913	1,813,098,000
Underwood-Simmons	1914	1,893,926,000
Do	1915	1,674,170,000
Do	1916	2,197,884,000

These facts constitute the record. That record can not be disputed or explained away, and it furnishes the conclusive answer to all the charges and imputations of the Republican Party with respect to the increase in imports under the present law before the war. Misrepresentation and hypocrisy have never brought success to any cause and it will not do so this year.

In passing, in this connection it may be well to call attention to the stress laid by the Republicans on the circumstance that during the four months of April, May, June, and July, 1914, our imports exceeded our exports by something over $19,000,000. They never tire of referring to this fact. It is trumpeted as a fact which utterly condemns the present law. It is used by them as an unanswerable argument in support of their charge that it is a public menace.

I am sure our Republican friends in pursuing this line of argument have overlooked the record of imports and exports for the year 1910, the first year of the Payne-Aldrich law. If they will take the trouble to examine it they will find the following:

February, 1910:
Imports	$130,117,980
Exports	124,558,630
March, 1910:
Imports	162,999,535
Exports	143,657,857
Total imports for two months	293,197,415
Total exports for two months	268,216,487
Excess of imports over exports for two months	24,900,928

This examination makes it unnecessary to consider further the Republican assault upon the present law on account of an excess of imports over exports for a few months.

But this is not all. If we take the average annual increase in our total imports, free and dutiable, from 1899 to 1914, we find that this increase is 11.44 per cent, against 4.5 per cent during the year 1914—the first year under the present law.

I hereto attach tables of imports for these two periods, giving the percentage of increase during each period.

These tables show that of the general imports for the fiscal years beginning with 1899 the average annual increase in imports free of duty from 1899 to 1914, the first year of the present law, to be 18.36 per cent, as against 14.2 per cent during the fiscal year 1914—the first year under the present law.

These tables also show that the average annual increase in dutiable imports from 1899 to 1914 was 6.21 per cent, as against 7.17 per cent for the year 1914—the first year under the present law.

These tables show that average annual increase in both free and dutiable from 1899 to 1914 was 11.14 per cent, as against 4.5 per cent for 1914.

THIRD CHARGE.

Nor is it true that our Democratic tariff brought about a curtailment of our sales abroad during the period of its operation before the war. The amount of goods a nation sells abroad, like the amount of goods a merchant sells to his customers, depends upon the ability of the customer to buy.

There was a period of world depression in 1914. On account of this depression the nations with whom we trade did not buy as heavily during that year as usual, either from us or from other nations, and for this reason our sales abroad during the Democratic fiscal year of 1914 were not as great as during the Republican fiscal year of 1913, but, with the single exception of the year 1912, our exports during the Democratic fiscal year of 1914 were greater than in any previous year of all of our history; greater than in any year under the McKinley tariff; greater than in any year under the Dingley tariff; greater than in any other year under the Payne-Aldrich tariff.

I hereto attach a table taken from the Monthly Summary of Commerce, for June, 1916, showing our imports under the Dingley law, under the Payne-Aldrich law, and under the present law up to 1917, also our total exports for the same period, and our total balance of trade for the same period:

Balance of trade of United States.

[Monthly Summary of Commerce, June, 1916.]

Dingley	1909	$1,311,920,000	$1,663,011,000

Do	1916	2,197,884,000	4,333,659,000	2,135,775,000
		Average, $420,396,300.		Average, $1,233,615,700.

This table shows that—

The increase in general imports under the Payne-Aldrich bill during its life was $502,000,000, or a yearly average increase of $125,500,000.

The increase in general imports under the present law for the first three years was $385,000,000, or a yearly average of $128,300,000.

The increase in the total exports of goods from the United States under the Payne-Aldrich bill during its life was $803,000,000, a yearly average of $200,750,000.

The increase in the total exports under the present law for the first three years was $1,868,000,000, or a yearly average of $622,700,000.

The balance of trade for the first three years under the Payne-Aldrich law was $1,261,000,000, an annual average of $420,400,000.

The balance of trade for the first three years under the present law was $3,700,800,000, or an annual average balance of $1,233,600,000.

FOURTH CHARGE—BUSINESS DEPRESSION.

Republican politicians likewise charge that this bill during the first year before the war brought disaster to business. I say politicians because the business interests made no such charge. These politicians charge that before the war began our tariff legislation had brought the country to the verge of bankruptcy and industrial ruin. It is true when we assumed control of the Government we found a condition of business depression. It was a depression which started before we came into power and which continued for some while after we came into power. It was not a depression, however, confined to this country. The same depression existed throughout the world. It was less acute here than elsewhere. It was less acute here than in Europe. Less acute here than in Canada. Less acute here than in South America and other parts of the world. But it came about under Republican administration and it continued for a while after we came into power.

But for months before the outbreak of the war there had been a recovery from these conditions, confidence had been restored, and prosperity had returned. The voice of great metropolitan journals, of great national trade agencies, of great captains of industry, from one end of the country to the other, proclaiming in no uncertain terms that prosperity was not only coming, but had already arrived and to stay, had silenced the partisan clamor of professional politicians and calamity howlers.

Mr. President, at this point I ask permission to attach as an appendix to my remarks clippings from a mass of great newspapers, magazines, trade journals, and agencies covering a period of six months immediately before the war, voicing this return of prosperity and declaring that it has come to stay, and that business had no further fear about it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, permission is granted.

The matter referred to will be found as an appendix to Mr. SIMMONS's remarks.

SUMMARY.

Mr. SIMMONS. First. The net result of this analysis is that the present bill did not prove a failure as a revenue producer during the first year of its life, but that the receipts of the Treasury during that year were the greatest in our history up to that time.

Second. The increase in general imports during this period was not abnormal, and not as great as was estimated by its friends when it was passed. It was only about one-half as great as the increase during the last year of the Payne-Aldrich bill, and only about one-third as much as the increase during the first year of the Payne-Aldrich bill.

Third. Our exports for that year were not abnormally low, as the Republicans would have the people believe, but, with the single exception of the year 1913, the greatest of any previous year in all our history.

Fourth. Instead of bringing disaster to business before the war began, the depression which existed when the present administration went into office had disappeared, confidence had been restored, and prosperity returned, largely as a result of our splendid financial legislation and the satisfactory operations of the new tariff.

Finally, our Republican friends charge that the increase in imports, especially free imports, during the past fiscal year, stamps the present law as a free-trade measure and as a menace to the American producer and laboring man.

Here again the record not only contradicts but overwhelmingly answers the charge.

Our total imports for the fiscal year 1913, the last full year under the Payne-Aldrich law, amounted to $1,813,000,000, while in 1916 our total imports amounted to $2,197,000,000, an increase over the last year of the Payne-Aldrich Act of only $384,000,000, and an increase over those of 1914, the first year under the present law, of $304,000,000.

Our total exports for 1916, the latest year under the present law, exceeded those for the fiscal year 1913, the last year under the Payne-Aldrich law, $1,868,000,000, and exceeded those of 1914, the first year under the present law, $1,969,000,000.

This presents a net gain in our foreign trade balance for 1916 over 1913 of $1,484,000,000.

Does this show we have turned our domestic markets over to the foreign producer and laboring man? Yea, on the contrary, does it not show we have captured the foreign ma kets for the benefit of the American producer and laboring man?

During the last year of the Payne-Aldrich law 54 per cent of our imports came in free. The most of these imports were raw materials for the use of our manufacturers. It was a part of the policy of that party to permit these products to come in free. They did not think it bad policy to do that. They did not think it hurtful to do that, as we have not thought it bad policy or hurtful to do that.

Their criticism against our bill at the time of its enactment was that it would destroy our manufacturing industries, not because of free importation of raw materials, but because it would open the doors to a larger importation of manufactures ready for consumption. They were afraid of the factories of Great Britain, France, and Germany. They predicted a great increase in these imports as a result of our reduction in duties.

The facts show that this prediction was unfounded, and that instead of an increase there has been a very notable decrease in this class of imports, a decrease of $133,965,000.

I attach a table showing the character and quantity of imports and exports for 1914 and 1916:

It is true, Mr. President, that our imports for 1916 have increased over the last year of the Payne-Aldrich law about $384,000,000, but I deny that this increase is due solely or even chiefly to the tariff. I deny especially that it is due to the reduction or enlarging of the free list made by the present law.

On the contrary an examination of the record will show that it is due—

First. To the change in the character of our imports as a result of the war.

Second. To the greater demand for raw materials to enable our manufacturers to meet the foreign demand for their goods.

Third. To the great increase in price of imported goods.

The war has brought about a very remarkable change in the character of our imports.

While there has been a considerable increase in our free imports there has been a great falling off in our imports of dutiable products of manufactured goods, especially manufactures ready for consumption, the latter amounting in the last year to $134,000,000.

The falling off of our dutiable imports is due almost entirely to the fact that we import under normal conditions nearly two-thirds of our dutiable goods from Europe, but on account of the embargo placed by the war upon importations from many of the great manufacturing countries of that continent, and other war conditions, our imports of this character of goods from that source have decreased something around 40 per cent. This accounts for the falling off in our customs revenues.

On the other hand, the increase in our free imports is due in part to the fact that many of the neutral markets of the world, especially South America, unable to get their supplies from Europe, have been buying from us and we have had to take their raw materials in payment as Europe had to do.

In 1915 our free imports from Europe declined, as did our dutiable imports from that continent, but our free imports from the balance of the world increased 25.5 per cent. This increase in free imports came largely from countries which before the war bought their manufactures from Europe—Germany, France, Belgium, England. Being unable, on account of the war, to get their supply of manufactures from Europe, they were from necessity forced to buy them chiefly from us.

When these countries bought from Europe, they paid not in money but by exchange of such commodities as they produce, which, in the main, are things which our old and new tariff list as free. Now when forced to buy their manufactures from us they must pay for them either in the things which they have to sell or go without them. This has resulted in increasing our purchases, as well as our sales to these countries.

Secondly, the large increase in our exports has compelled an increase in our purchases of many things, especially raw materials, mostly free under both tariff acts, and which are used by our manufacturers to make the things we are now exporting in such large quantities. Many of these raw materials we do not produce at all, or if at all in insufficient quantities to meet the demands of our export trade. Without these purchases from abroad our great export trade of the past 18 or 20 months would have been practically impossible.

The importation of these crude foreign products has not curtailed but has enhanced and broadened the opportunity of American labor and production, and opened new avenues to American trade and commerce, stimulating and broadening our industrial activity, and added hundreds of millions of dollars to our national wealth.

Third. In the third place the price of most of the free as well as dutiable products we have imported has greatly increased on account of the war, and this increase in selling price has swelled the aggregate of our imports when measured in dollars and cents out of proportion to the actual increase in the quantity of the merchandise imported. In other words, because of the much higher prices in 1916 than in 1912, a statement of the value of the imports in 1916 as compared with 1912 does not measure the difference in the quantity of the merchandise imported in 1916 and 1912, and the same thing is true with reference to the revenue derived, especially where the duty is specific instead of ad valorem.

The truth of these statements as to imports is illustrated by the case of sugar. We imported practically the same number of pounds of sugar in 1914 and 1915, and yet our imports of sugar measured in dollars and cents—and that is the way we measure it—was $101,000,000 in 1914 and $202,000,000 in 1915. There was practically no increase in quantity of sugar imported, but measured in dollars there was an increase of $101,000,000. Here we have an increase of $101,000,000 with practically no increase in the quantity of the thing imported. The same is true in a large measure as to many other products.

The total increase in our imports for 1916 over 1914 amounted, as I have said before, to $304,000,000, while the total increase in our imports of crude materials for use in manufacturing during that period was $311,000,000. Most of these raw materials are free under both the old and the new law, so that the total increase in our imports for the use of our manufacturers is greater than the total increase of all of our imports.

That this increase has not been the result of the tariff is further shown by the fact that during the period of this increase in imports of raw materials for our factories there has been a contemporaneous decrease of $134,000,000 of manufactures ready for consumption.

Mr. President, in closing my remarks upon the first year under the present administration I spoke of a return of confidence and prosperity under conditions then existing. Barring a few months immediately after the war, when international trade was temporarily suspended, this tide of prosperity has continued to grow in ever-increasing volume until to-day we are the most prosperous people in the world. During the last fiscal year we sold abroad $2,135,000,000 worth of goods more than we bought abroad—more than three times as much as our excess sales abroad during the last year of the Payne-Aldrich bill—more than 10 times as much as our excess sales abroad under the first year of that tariff and 5 times as much as the average annual excess in our sales abroad during the four years of the Payne-Aldrich law.

The average annual increase in our imports under the present law exceeded the average annual increase of imports under the Payne-Aldrich law only about $3,000,000. This slight increase in our imports is, of course, but a bagatelle compared with the enormous increase in our exports.

From these facts it is manifest that instead of surrendering our markets to the foreigner we have invaded and captured his. There has been no betrayal of the American producer and laboring man, but a net gain of over $2,000,000,000 in cash receipts to the American producer and in jobs to the American laborer. Our present great prosperity has not been hurt by the slight increase in our foreign purchases, but our enormous sales abroad, out of which this prosperity has in part grown, have been made possible by these slightly increased purchases abroad. Without an increase in our purchases of crude products and raw materials from other countries our fields, mines, and factories could not have supplied the enormous foreign demand of the last year for their products, and without these purchases of their goods our foreign customers would have been without the means to pay for their purchases from us.

The theory of protection as exemplified in the teachings and practice of the Republican Party has been to discourage purchases from abroad of products produced here, and at least until recent years our manufacturers have made no special effort to cultivate and establish a foreign demand and market for their products; as a result our foreign trade has consisted largely in the purchase of such raw materials as were needed to supply our mills and factories and the sale of our surplus agricultural products. Whatever may be said in favor of this theory during the period of developing our production to the point of supplying the home demand, it must be obvious that when that degree of development has been reached further adherence to it halts development and produces industrial stagnation, which must eventually tend to contraction and retrocession. We have now unmistakably reached that state in commercial and industrial advance. If we seek expansion through foreign trade we must abandon a policy based upon the theory of isolation and exclusion. We must not by legislation close our markets to the foreigner if we wish him to open his to us. Even if he were willing to sanction this one-sided trade arrangement it would collapse because of its impracticability, for with a nation as with an individual, sustained purchasing capacity is essential to sustained selling capacity.

In this connection I wish to quote from an article appearing in the March issue of the Wall Street Magazine by the Hon. George E. Roberts, vice president of the National City Bank and former Director of the Mint. In this article Mr. Roberts, who is, as is well known, a Republican, says:

TRADE NOT ONE SIDED.

If anything has been demonstrated in the last year it has been the truth of that proposition that you can not have a permanently one-sided trade. All trade, in the last analysis, consists of an exchange of commodities. Any other means of settlement is a makeshift and necessarily temporary. We have kept our great export trade going in the last year, first by taking back our own securities, and then by taking over foreign securities. This, I say, is a makeshift. You can not build up a permanent foreign trade upon that basis or by insisting upon payment in gold. You can have no permanent trade that is not advantageous to all parties concerned; there must be an exchange of service and commodities. An industrial country which aspires to sell finished products abroad must be willing to receive the crude commodities of other countries.

APPENDIX.

ALTOONA, PA., July 7.

In every department of the Altoona shops, the industrial center of the Pennsylvania Railroad Co., working full time and many of the departments working overtime, this city is enjoying an unsurpassed era of prosperity. (New York World of July 8, 1914.)

PITTSBURGH, July 7.

Anticipating a big increase in freight business, the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co. has put on 700 men in its shops. (New York World, July 8, 1914.)

Mr. Ford told the President that the automobile business never was better, and that there is a substantial increase in the business this year over last year. Mr. Ford stated that the increase in his business was so great that he is preparing to enlarge his plant. * * * Mr. Ford did not confine himself to a discussion of his own line as an evidence of good times. He went into the matter generally, telling of the steel industry and its allied business. (New York World, July 10, 1914.)

PITTSBURGH, July 10.

The Chronicle-Telegraph, Senator GEORGE T. OLIVER'S afternoon daily paper, prints the following to-day: "Pittsburgh is the first of the American cities to recover from the depression in business which has affected the entire country. * * * Pittsburgh is returning to its old-time prosperity."

All branches of trade, the paper declares, are feeling the stimulus of returning normal conditions. (New York World, p. 4, July 11, 1914.)

PITTSBURGH, July 17.

Voting their confidence in such a return to good times that a record year is in prospect, the independent sheet and tin-plate manufacturers, principally of the Middle West, the Western Bar-Iron Association, and the big independent steel concerns, the Republic Iron & Steel Co. have just completed signing scales for affiliated mills with the Amalgamated Association Iron, Steel, and Tin Workers. President Williams, of the Amalgamated Association, said: "We based our fight on a return of prosperity, and the manufacturers are granting what we asked, felt the same way about it, and that a big year for their business was ahead." A long list of concerns in Ohio, Illinois, Indiana, Missouri, and some in Pennsylvania is given with the statement that they are all going to work now. (New York World, p. 4, July 17, 1914.)

S. R. Burton, banker, and Joseph B. Gallinger, a manufacturer of New York, called on the President to-day. Both informed the Executive that business conditions were improving right along, and the country was entering an era of prosperity. (New York World, July 21, 1914.)

"ONE YEAR OF DEMOCRATIC RULE."

[From the New York World Washington Correspondent.]

WHAT WILSON HAS ACHIEVED IN FIRST YEAR—NO SUCH RECORD MADE BY ANY PREDECESSOR.

WASHINGTON, February 28, 1914.

For the first time in 50 years the hand of Wall Street has been removed from the Government of the United States.

This desirable result is regarded by President Wilson as the paramount achievement of his administration. He considers the elimination of Wall Street as a dominating factor in many governmental functions the best gift of triumphant Democracy to the American people. The removal of this blighting influence will prove beneficial, if not permanent.

Aside from this accomplished blessing, the President views the creation of a new banking and currency system as the most notable event of his incumbency. He believes this great reform takes precedence over downward revision of the tariff, with the partial destruction of special privilege and the transfer of taxation from poverty to wealth.

One year of Woodrow Wilson's service as President of the United States and leader of the Democratic Party has become history. One-fourth of his elective period has expired. In taking stock no Chief Executive has ever found such a remarkable record of performance to his credit. With persistence and wisdom he has steadfastly urged redemption of all pledges carried in the Baltimore platform. He has been supported by both branches of Congress to a more marked degree than any predecessor in office.

GREAT ACHIEVEMENTS.

Among the great achievements which President Wilson has guided to consummation are:

A banking and currency law which has removed the hand of Wall Street and established a democracy of credit.

A tariff act comprising reduction in duties on imported necessities and calculated to lower the cost of living. No favoritism has been shown protected interests, but the people were substituted as beneficiaries. In framing this legislation the supervision of Wall Street and special interests was rejected.

The lobby, representing all those who profited from legislation, through publicity on the part of Mr. Wilson, was removed as a powerful instrumentality in the shaping of statutes. As a result of exposures made by the President, this obnoxious feature of congressional intimidation was removed.

Two important amendments to the Constitution—the first adopted in 43 years—were made effective. One provides for the direct election of Senators by the people. The other authorizes the imposition of a tax on incomes, thus transferring the burden of maintaining the Government from the poor to the wealthy.

Proposals were made to all civilized nations for the arrangement of treaties whereby actual hostilities would be deferred during a year of reflection. Thirty Governments signified their acceptance of this principle.

RETURN TO POPULAR GOVERNMENT.

A return to popular government was encouraged when the President appeared in person and addressed the two branches of Congress on legislative propositions. He thus sought to terminate domination through private arrangements and secret conferences by the aid of public opinion.

The amendment of laws whereby arbitration of disputes between capital and labor was made more successful.

The constitution of peace presented by the President has gone far in the direction of breaking up interlocking directorates, which formed the backbone of trusts and monopolies.

The helping hand of the Government was extended to the farmers when $50,000,000 were distributed to assist in moving crops.

The divorcement of the Government from the New York financial concerns that proposed cooperation with foreign Governments in furnishing funds for China.

The employment of peaceable methods by which the Telephone Trust was dissolved without litigation or expense.

The policy of diplomatic postponement under which the unsettled relations between the United States and Mexico have been handled.

The placing of the Postal System on a self-sustaining basis for the first time in governmental history.

The Parcel Post System has been developed and extended to a remarkable degree of efficiency and benefit.

MAJORITY RULE IN CONGRESS.

Parliamentary rules in the Senate and House were amended, removing the heritage received from Aldrich and Cannon, leaving the majority to control.

The pure-food act was extended to include inspection of all meats, thus affording adequate protection to American consumers.

A bureau of markets was established in the Department of Agriculture, providing a scientific method by which farm products may be transported and distributed.

The Armor Plate Trust was compelled to submit competitive bids in connection with the construction of American battleships. The Government was saved more than $2,000,000.

The special delivery system was extended to the parcel post.

The home life of the farmer was given consideration by the Department of Agriculture. Encouragement in the utilization of labor-saving devices was contained in 55,000 letters sent out.

The full protection of the law has been given Indian children.

A new public-land policy was inaugurated. It combines conservation and the proper use of the national domain.

The enactment of an agricultural extension law, which is expected to double the production of American farms.

The institution in the Navy of academic, vocational, and technical instruction.

The two great transportation monopolies of the East and West were forced to dissolve. The Pennsylvania Railroad relinquished its holdings in the Baltimore & Ohio. The Southern and Union Pacific merger was canceled.

The extinction of many great combinations in restraint of trade by agreement.

The ratification of eight general arbitration treaties, which will enable the President to adjust numerous foreign disputes and complications that now prove irritating. Among the treaties approved were those between the United States and Great Britain and with Japan.

The establishment of an eight-hour day for women and girls in the District of Columbia.

TO REDEEM PLATFORM PROMISES.

Marvelous as has been the record of performance, it represents less than 50 per cent of President Wilson's plans for redeeming platform promises and perpetuating prosperity for the people. In addition to the achievements indicated, he has planned and started on the road to legislative completion more beneficial propositions than any predecessor. Many of these will soon be on the statute books. All the remaining features of his program will be enacted into law before another anniversary of presidential incumbency is reached.

The list of important matters under way includes:

The negotiation and ratification of a treaty with Colombia by which payment shall be made for the loss of Panama and the Canal Zone. This is considered on a parity with the great achievements of the past year. It is intended to remove the stain upon national honor caused by the violent seizure of Panama and restore friendly relations with a sister Republic.

The repeal of the tolls-exemption clause in the Adamson Act, under which American coastwise vessels are given free use of the Panama Canal. This is expected to remove causes for irritation between this Government and those of Great Britain and other maritime powers. It will demonstrate that the United States is willing to respect all treaty obligations.

The ratification by the Senate of 16 additional general arbitration treaties.

The continued arrangement of peace treaties until all civilized nations have been brought into a "breathing" agreement with this country.

Continued efforts for the restoration of peace in Mexico without intervention or the employment of force.

Perfection of a treaty with Nicaragua under which this Government will acquire the right to construct a canal over the Nicaraguan route and secure sites for a naval base and fortifications to protect the Panama waterway.

Legislation under which the Federal Government and the various States will unite in the construction of good roads.

STATEMENT OF SUPERINTENDENT OF EMPLOYMENT BUREAU AS TO NUMBER OF PEOPLE OUT OF EMPLOYMENT.

J. J. Fitzgerald, head of the employment department of Gimbel Bros., said:

"Several days ago we placed a big display advertisement in the four leading New York newspapers asking for applications for positions of milliners, copyists, milliner helpers, and apprentices. We offered the highest salaries obtainable by this class of help in New York City. We expected hundreds of applications, but received only seven. The advertisement was taken out of the classified columns and placed in other parts of these four papers, in the belief that we would have better results, but they failed to bring a single answer.

"Picture fitters usually are to be had in any number. We advertised for them, and received seven applications. Two years ago, when business was unusually prosperous, according to all reports, we frequently had 8 and 10 applications from chauffeurs. If we told them that we could not take them on, they frequently asked to be employed as helpers until there was an opening. Now we have few applications, and I haven't heard a chauffeur ask for a helper's job for many months.

MORE HELP NEEDED.

"I was looking over our employment sheets and wondering where I was to obtain more help when the head of the mail-order department telephoned to me and said that he would need several men. Every department store in the city is confronted with the same situation with which we are faced, and I can not remember any period when there was a less number of applicants for work than at present.

"Just previous to the holidays we had hundreds of applications for work, and if there was any business depression it was to be felt then, to judge from the number of unemployed. If we had advertised at that time for sewing-machine salesmen we would have received scores of applications, many of the persons making an effort to 'bluff' their way through. A few days ago we advertised for this same kind of help and received two applications."

ONE CLASS ALWAYS "OUT OF WORK."

James T. Hunt, business manager of the Bowery Mission and head of the Mission Employment Bureau, said:

"We are having a great number of applicants for work, but not a sufficient number to lead us to think that there are 350 000 men out of work in New York City alone, as has been said. Several months ago we had hundreds of applications from men who had been laid off by railroads, street car lines, telephone and telegraph companies, but they soon began to grow scarce, and I understand that most of them have again been placed at work at their trades.

"It would make no difference what state of prosperity we had, there would always be a certain element looking for work and making a howl about hard times. It is easy to discriminate between this class and that composed of able-bodied, willing, and intelligent workmen who may be thrown out of employment. We will always have both classes to deal with, irrespective of how good business conditions may be.

"During the seven years that our empoyment bureau has been in existence we have placed 22,000 men. At present we are receiving just as many calls for men as we received during the time when we were supposed to be enjoying an unusual run of prosperity. Manufacturing plants that were partly closed down two months ago are again working with full forces, and in many instances I have heard of extra men being placed at work to take care of increasing business."

GAIN IN TYPEWRITER BUSINESS.

Alfred Augustus Fraser, general manager of the New York office of the Remington Typewriter Co., at No. 327 Broadway, said that his company's business has shown a decided improvement in the last two months.

"Business is better with us in all parts of the country," said Mr. Fraser, "but in New York the improvement is more marked than elsewhere. Our sales in December greatly exceeded those for December, 1912, and since January 1 we are far ahead of our business for the corresponding period in 1913. Orders and contracts now in hand assure us a profitable year. We feel certain that business in general must be good and getting better, because there is no surer barometer to the condition of trade than the typewriting industry. Our employment agency also reflects the healthful tone of business. There is an increased demand to-day for stenographers, and we find that salaries are running higher than they have been for many a day. Employers are ready to pay more now for stenographers and bookkeepers than they were willing to pay at any time last year. Good operators are in demand daily, and where last year they had trouble in obtaining permanent places at relatively low wages they are finding them now at salaries that give no concern about making ends meet."

STATEMENT OF MRS. HARRIMAN, RESIDENT COMMISSIONER ON UNITED STATES INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS, TO THE EFFECT THAT CONDITIONS ARE ABOUT THE SAME IN LABOR MARKET NOW AS THEY ARE AT THIS SEASON EACH YEAR.

Mrs. J. Borden Harriman, resident commissioner of the United States Commission on Industrial Relations, to-day gave out the following statement supplementing yesterday's announcement of an investigation by the commission into unemployment:

"Anyone who fails to realize that conditions are about the same in the labor market now as they are at this season each year is either ignorant of conditions or insincere.

"The unskilled laborers, who are the chief sufferers from these annual periods of unemployment, are for the most part migratory and belong to the class known as floating labor. This makes the problem an interstate one, which can only be adequately studied by a Federal body."

[Editorial from the New York Herald, Tuesday, Feb. 17, 1914.]

UNEMPLOYED IN NEW YORK—AN "ARMY" THAT HAS DISAPPEARED.

President Wilson is fully justified in questioning "statistics" that assume to show the presence of 350,000, or anything like that number, of unemployed in this city. The Herald certainly challenges their accuracy, and examples of Sunday and of yesterday furnish ample warrant for the challenge.

Confronted by the herculean task of clearing the city's streets of the heavy accumulation of snow, Commissioner Featherstone and the contractors working under him sent out urgent calls for men. The response was prompt on the part of those who wanted work. Every man who applied was employed, and still the need for men remained.

Were there 350,000 applicants? Were there one-half, one-tenth that number? Mr. A. F. Gunther, superintendent of the bureau of snow removal, said he had about 13,000 men working yesterday. "We could use many more if they would apply," Mr. Gunther added. Either the "vast army of the unemployed" upon which the croakers have been harping has never existed or it vanished at the first suggestion of work.

STATEMENT GIVEN THE NEW YORK HERALD BY MR. GOMPERS FEBRUARY 26, 1914.

Unfortunately there is considerable unemployment among the working people of our country—and in so far as when any one man is unemployed through no fault of his own, to him it appears that all our social fabric is a failure—but that reports of the tremendous number of unemployed are much exaggerated I have not the slightest doubt. We are in the midst of winter and are now passing through the transitory stage of reconstructive tariff and banking legislation, and my experience warrants me in saying that the number of unemployed at present is comparatively less than during similar seasons of the year when tariff legislation had previously just been enacted. I am also decidedly of the opinion that the period of unemployment will be much shorter than during former similar periods and transitory conditions. The adjustment of industry to the new conditions is of vital consideration.

BUSINESS CONDITIONS.

There are three facts which answer completely the charge that conditions are panicky and that there is no work for the man who wants to work.

First is the fact, admitted by the leader of the House in the discussion in that body on last Friday, not denied by anybody, that there is plenty of money to be had for investment at low rates of interest.

Second, while there has been a slight drop in prices of commodities, prices, as a rule, have been maintained.

Third, wages have been maintained.

These conditions are absolutely the reverse of conditions that exist in times of panic or business stagnation.

[Extract from speech by Representative Ansberry, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.]

CALAMITY-CRY POLITICS SHOWN BY PLATE MATTER SENT BY OHIO REPUBLICAN EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE.

Some time in January of this year the Republican organization in the State of Ohio sent out boiler-plate matter to the little weekly and daily Republican papers throughout the State of Ohio on this same question, containing a calamity howl. Among other papers they sent this boiler-plate matter to the Medina County Gazette, which is supposed to be a stalwart Republican paper; but the Gazette did not look at the world through the colored spectacles of the gentleman who has charge of that organization, and here is what the Republican paper said with reference to the attitude of these men:

"DASTARDLY POLITICS.

"There has been nothing more reprehensible in American politics than the present studied effort on the part of the standpat forces in control of the Republican Party to aid and abet an era of hard times in this country. It was openly proclaimed at the recent meeting of the Republican national committee at Washington that hard times, want, and poverty were to be the life-savers of that party. To-day from every standpat source is coming a calamity howl coldly calculated to shake business confidence and bring on industrial paralysis.

"As we write there lies on our desk a copy of the Republican News Letter, dated at Columbus, January 3, 1914. Editors are invited to use the contents of this letter in whole or in part. And what is this Republican News Letter that all the editors of Ohio are 'invited' to use and bring before their readers? It is a pure calamity howl calculated to bring on a business panic, if possible, and it is nothing else. Its one big flaring headline reads: 'Industrial depression.' Then follow three columns of 'calamity' talk, prophesying hard times and business disaster.

"At a recent meeting of the Republican national committee at Washington Senator REED SMOOT, national committeeman from Utah, was cheered again and again when he airily made the following declaration for a turkey-buzzard policy for his party: 'The silent wheels of the factories, the smokeless stacks of our mills, and the suffering of our people under a Democratic administration will speak louder than any national declaration of principles that we can make. All we have to do to bring victory to our banners will be to point to the closed mill doors and say: "Wilson—that's all."'

"No declaration of principles needed, says SMOOT; just wait for calamity and suffering.

"From every other stand-pat Republican source is coming the same sort of business poison—the studied attempt to bring suffering and want to millions of American citizens to further the political ends of the PENROSES and SMOOTS and Barneses and Daughertys now in control of the Republican Party.

"The attempt to inject this poison into the business arteries of this country is made, too, when reliable financial authorities like Bradstreets's and Dun's and Henry Clews tell us that the business outlook for 1914 is brightening daily and that there is no business depression nor panic ahead.

* * * * * * *

"The despicable political panic effort has already failed. The country is aroused against it, and the boomerang is already recoiling upon its projectors.

"The political party that seeks a new lease of life at the hands of American voters by encouraging panic and hard times badly miscalculates, for it can reap from such foul sowing only the contempt and distrust of all right-thinking people."

[From the New York Herald, February 17, 1914.]

CHICAGO.

Charles A. Stevens, president of Charles A. Stevens & Bros., dealers in women's wear: "The prospects of spring trade are better than they have been for several years."

Modie J. Spiegil, treasurer of May, Stern Bros.: "The merchants and jobbers are making more and larger orders than they have in a long time. From the reports I have received from all parts of the country, I take it that these improved conditions are universal."

E. D. Hurlbert, president of Merchants Loan & Trust Co.: "All indications are that the improvement is sound and permanent."

SAGINAW, MICH.

"Industrially, Saginaw has never been in better condition than to-day, and the business prospects never looked brighter. Bankers, manufacturers, and merchants are all enthusiastic." W. S. Lenters, Republican postmaster, said: "The future never looked brighter for Saginaw than it does at the present time."

Charles W. McClure, Republican, president of one of the largest silo-manufacturing concerns in the United States, said: "Our business is 10 times as great as at any time in the history of our company, and prospects never looked brighter for all five of our plants."

W. R. Burt, one of Michigan's wealthiest citizens, is very enthusiatic over the business outlook. He said: "This prosperous condition not only prevails in Saginaw, but statements from towns throughout the St. Croix district show business throughout the section to be excellent, with the best possible prospects for the future."

WICHITA, KANS.

That prosperity has settled on Wichita is evinced by the amount of building that is being contracted for at present. Prospects for the largest crops in the history of the State were never better.

B. F. McLean, president of the Fourth National Bank and a prominent Republican: "Everyone is feeling fine over the outlook."

Judge E. B. Juritt, vice president of the Farmers & Bankers' Life Insurance Co., a prominent Republican, said: "Every condition points to better times. The farmers all have money."

WHAT THE FOLKS BACK HOME SAY.

DANVILLE, ILL.

Danville, home of JOSEPH G. CANNON, is in a rich agricultural region. The failure of some crops and curtailment of others, owing to the long drought last summer and the unseasonable weather of fall and this winter, have been felt by business men of this city and the eighteenth congressional district in general; but most of them declare that, notwithstanding these handicaps, their business for the last year has been equal to, and in many instances greater, than any year since 1907.

There have been no business failures here; every business room is occupied, and merchants generally unite in predicting unprecedented prosperity for the next year, barring another crop failure. Real estate values are gradually increasing after several years of depression, and arrangements are being made for unusual building operations with the opening of spring.

Augustus I. Webster, Republican, president of the Webster Grocery Co., is an optimist on the future business outlook of this city and vicinity.

"Early in 1913 the prevailing conditions caused me to believe that business conditions would not improve during the last year, but my opinion was not verified," he said to-day. "The year 1913 was productive of bigger business than any year since I came to Danville, almost half a century ago. I believe every wholesale concern in Danville also enjoyed the same measure of prosperity.

"Comparing conditions existing at the present time with the conditions a year ago, I firmly believe that 1914 will be a greater season for the wholesale business in Danville than the eminently successful year of 1913. This is saying a great deal, but existing commercial and industrial conditions in Danville is the reason for my belief."

Charles L. English, Republican, president of the First National Bank, was more outspoken concerning his opinion of "Uncle JOE'S" calamity talk.

"This is largely an agricultural country," said Mr. English, "and, of course, the failure of the oats crop, partial failure of the corn and other crops, was a severe blow from the principal money-producing source. Labor is now pretty generally employed, and there is a fair degree of prosperity in every branch of business. Money may be a little tight for the next six months, but I regard prospects for the coming year as being very bright."

M. S. Plant, Republican, a leading clothing merchant, said: "I regard the business outlook for the coming year as exceptionally good, barring another crop failure."

J. S. Emery, head of a large dry-goods firm; H. C. Adams, president of a building association, and Joseph Schingel, jr., a prominent contractor, expressed practically the same views as the above. One of them stated that the general feeling of optimism for the future and congratulation over past and present conditions in the face of adverse circumstances ought to be sufficient answer to "Uncle JOE."

SEATTLE, WASH.

"Business conditions in the Pacific Northwest," said C. B. Yandell, secretary of the Seattle Chamber of Commerce, "are 20 per cent better to-day than they were during the corresponding period a year ago. Bank clearings, customs receipts, building permits, and railroad business prove my statement. Prospects of the early recognition in the House of Alaskan needs, the opening of the Panama Canal, the recent abundant rains are sure to bring on a feeling that the entire Pacific coast country, particularly Seattle and the Northwest, is entering into an era of prosperity not known here in five years.

CONCORD, N. H.

Secretary James O. Lyford, of the Concord Board of Trade, who was naval officer of the port of Boston from 1898 to 1913, and who now is mentioned as a Republican candidate for the United States Senate in succession to Senator GALLINGER, said to-night that there was no business depression in this city or vicinity and no indication that anything of the sort was impending.

"With one exception," he said, "every Concord industry is employing as many men to-day, at as high wages and for as many hours in the week, as was the case a year or two years ago. The one exception is the shops of the Boston & Maine Railroad, where the force employed has been diminished one-fourth owing to the opening of the road's new shops at Billerica, Mass.

"Both our wholesale and retail business houses report trade and collections up to the average for this season of the year."

LYNN, MASS.

After a period of depression, during which hundreds of employees were laid off, the big plant of the General Electric Co. here is getting busy again, and, according to Walter C. Fisher, its general manager, the outlook is bright. Many of the employees who were laid off have returned to work, and within a short time it is expected that every department of the plant will be in operation again. This is the between-seasons period for the shoe factories, but most of them here are busier than they have been for several months, and most of the manufacturers are confident that business will improve steadily from now on. The percentage of persons out of work in Lynn is very small compared with other years.

SIXTEEN HUNDRED MEN RESUME WORK AT GARY STEEL MILLS.

CHICAGO, ILL.

More than 1,600 men have been put back to work recently and the plant is operating about 80 per cent of capacity.

Declaring he is glad to find a factor like the Herald substantiating the position of optimism regarding business conditions he assumed more than a year ago, Henry R. Towne, president of the Yale & Towne Manufacturing Co. and formerly president of the Merchants' Association, said yesterday that he believes business everywhere is safe, sound, and promising.

"Speaking of my own business," Mr. Towne said, "and the insight that gives to allied businesses, and my contact with business men from every part of the country, I hold, and I have steadily held for a year, the conviction that business everywhere is in a sound, safe, and promising condition."

That business conditions in this country are improving as a result of public confidence following the enactment of currency legislation was the statement made to the Herald yesterday by L. H. Shearman, vice president of W. R. Grace & Co., exporters, of No. 7 Hanover Square. Mr. Shearman said:

"It will be admitted by all business men that conditions are improving and that things will be better within a short time. The public fear that President Wilson's currency and tariff legislation might cause serious trouble if not precipitate a money panic, as was predicted by many, proved to be unfounded and a healthy reaction is now taking place. From now on I look for a steady advance in the volume of business in this country."

OPINION OF C. A. SCHIEREN, JR.

Charles A. Schieren, jr., of the Charles A. Schieren Co., No. 34 Ferry Street, and first vice president of the American Manufacturers' Export Association, said that after a careful study of business conditions prevailing in this country the promises for great industrial activity in the coming spring are excellent. Mr. Schieren said:

"There was a decrease in the volume of business by our company in January of only 7 per cent, as compared with the figures for the same month last year. But that loss promises to be made up by a corresponding increase in the business for the current month. These facts, coupled with reliable information supplied to me by correspondents in the Middle West, assure me that a steady, healthful revival of business is in progress.

"Every business man felt the effect of the calamity cries which arose when the tariff and currency legislation was being discussed. The pessimists seemingly convinced the people of the country that if either of President Wilson's measures was passed a death blow to business would be dealt. But happily this prediction was not verified, the fact being that public confidence, upon which the prosperity of the Nation actually depends, has been restored."

COTTON MILLS INCREASE OUTPUT.

Edward K. Cone, president of the New York Cotton Exchange, said that there is a strong revival of business in the industries associated with cotton. The cotton mills not only have not closed, as was predicted by pessimists, but have steadily increased their output. The consumption of cotton at the mills during January established a new high record. "All the statistics and estimates of the cotton trade," said Mr. Cone, "bear out the Herald's contention that at the base of commercial conditions all is well."

NO HALT IN GROCERY TRADE.

Few men have a better opportunity of obtaining information regarding the general aspect of trade and business than M. E. Roche, manager of the Butler grocery stores throughout the city. Daily he meets salesmen from all parts of the country and confers with the managers of the many stores over which he has supervision. He has to make estimates and purchase accordingly. When business conditions are on the wane he is among the first to realize the fact. When they are otherwise his source of information never fails him. This is what he thinks of the outlook:

"I think the prospect never was better. Business to-day is in a splendid condition. We know by the purchases that are made daily. When there is uncertainty and lack of confidence there is a decrease in the sale of luxuries. At present there is no such thing. As far as the public is concerned, the alarmist reports of a few months ago fell on deaf ears.

"Our business year ended on November 1 last. It was a very successful one. Since then, in view of the various reports which have been circulated concerning the general business situation, I have maintained a close surveillance upon our own affairs. The result is that I am able to report that for the period between November 1 and to-day I find that we are ahead of the corresponding period of last year.

"I do not regard the situation simply from my own standpoint. In the course of my daily routine I meet and converse with men who are active in other lines. Many of these are salesmen, who come here with goods to sell and whose opportunities for gleaning authentic information are remarkably good.

"When sales are slow for them it indicates that business is slow generally. If the merchant is slow to purchase, his sales are not up to the average, and if the public is hesitant, then everything becomes more or less stagnant. But that is not the case now. Everyone seems to be ready to purchase in good quantity."

TEXTILE TRADES PROSPER.

Thomas Smidt, a member of the dry goods firm of Victor & Achelis, was another who sounded a note of optimism concerning the situation of trade.

"Our own business is in splendid condition," he said, "and the textile trade in general throughout the country is flourishing. That I know. Merchants are beginning to realize that no ill effects have been felt from the change in the tariff, and that none may be expected. This, of course, lends stimulus to trade.

"The prospects for the near future are just as bright as those of a year ago, and as far as we are concerned all departments are just as busy as they ever were. We observe also that trade all around us is in healthy condition, and we place no credence whatever in what some persons have been declaring about hard times. We have plenty of confidence. The Herald's attitude in the matter is praiseworthy indeed."

Samuel S. Campbell, vice president and director of the Fourth National Bank and director in several other concerns, stated that he observed distinct signs of improvement in the business situation generally.

"We observe a much better outlook," he remarked.

COASTWISE SHIPPING ACTIVE.

Anton A. Raven, president of the American Bureau of Shipping, said:

"The surest barometer of business conditions I know of is the coastwise shipping trade. There is no better argument that I can advance to show that business generally throughout the country is prospering than to point to the increasing amount of business being handled by our coastwise vessels.

"There has been no appreciable change either for good or worse in the foreign shipping, although an increase was expected in the imports when the new tariff schedule went into effect. Our exports still lead the imports by a healthy margin, and from all indications it would be safe to say that they will show a greater gain at the end of the fiscal year than ever before in history. The shipping interests which confine their operations solely to the coastwise trade have nothing but encouraging news to give out on conditions to-day and the outlook for the future.

"With the situation cleared up in Mexico I believe there will be a great step forward in conditions in this country."

George Doubleday, president of the Ingersoll-Rand Co., said: "Business everywhere is improving, and I hear few complaints. The Ingersoll-Rand Co. is working full time again, and many of the big industrial plants are employing extra help. I hear nothing but encouraging reports. It seems to me that this talk of a business depression is absurd."

ENGINEERING CONCERN BUSY.

S. L. Selden, of the J. G. White Corporation, of No. 43 Exchange Place, one of the foremost engineering and construction concerns of the country, said that in his opinion the country would this year enjoy one of the most prosperous years commercially and industrially known in decades. Mr. Selden said:

"There is not the shadow of a doubt in my mind but we are entering up a highly prosperous year. This conviction is based upon a careful study of the situation and comparison with the statistical data of previous years. Last autumn we wondered if we would find work enough to keep our forces employed during the winter. That question was answered when we received so many commissions that we must work hard to keep up with them.

"If business conditions had not improved, our corporation would have been among the first to suffer. It is because of this that I say with confidence that this will be a banner year in this country. There never was anything fundamentally wrong with industrial conditions in this country, but the depression noticeable last year was almost wholly due to the groundless fear that radical changes in our financial and tariff systems would bring hard times. This fear was aggravated by senseless predictions of disappointed politicians, but in the face of it all confidence is returning, and with it the inevitable revival of business along all lines."

GOOD TRADE REPORTS IN WEST AND SOUTH—MERCHANTS, BUYERS, AND TRAVELERS ALL SEE EVIDENCES OF PROSPERITY THROUGHOUT COUNTRY.

Buyers from all sections of the country, traveling salesmen, and manufacturers who were in New York yesterday were practically unanimous in the opinion that the United States is on the threshold of one of the greatest eras of prosperity in its history.

The general business conditions of the country were reflected by the fact that in most cases the buyers are increasing their orders for stocks of goods, according to the buyers and merchants whom I interviewed yesterday.

One of the large buyers who makes frequent trips to New York is George B. Monning, of the Monning Dry Goods Co., Fort Worth, Tex., who is staying at the Albert Hotel, University Place and Eleventh Street.

"The business prospects in Texas," said Mr. Monning, "are much better than at any time in the last six years. This is a conservative opinion based on a thorough knowledge of business conditions throughout the entire State."

GOOD REPORTS FROM GEORGIA.

One of the largest manufacturers of Georgia is L. M. Lynch, who is at the Albert Hotel. Mr. Lynch's concern, the Muscogee Manufacturing Co., of Columbus, Ga., which is in the cotton-goods manufacturing business, has a New York office at No. 47 Leonard Street.

"I have traveled all through the South and the Middle West recently," said Mr. Lynch yesterday, "and I know from personal experience and observation that the country is just as prosperous as the Herald's interviews and editorials have stated."

Walter Lassiter, who is a traveling salesman for Eugene Teschner & Co., dealers in flowers and feathers, at No. 719 Broadway, said that he had just returned from a trip through the Carolinas, Maryland, and Virginia, and found a wonderful condition of prosperity throughout those sections.

"In my own State of North Carolina," he said, "everything is moving in a satisfactory manner. Merchants, farmers, bankers, and, in fact, everybody is prosperous, with the outlook bright for more prosperity during the coming year. Sales are good and everybody is happy."

LABOR.

In discussing the matter every man interviewed said that, so far as he knew, the price of labor had not been reduced. They used this argument to refute the contention that there are unusually large numbers of unemployed men throughout the country.

"If the supply of labor is greater than the demand," they said, "and this situation exists for a great length of time, the price will fall because of the competition. We have noticed no such condition in our section."

SOUTH ENJOYING BOOM TIMES.

"The South is not entering upon but it is enjoying the greatest era of prosperity in its history. The Civil War no longer is a date for commercial comparison. From the Shenandoah to the Gulf and from the Carolinas to Texas the reign of Midas is more nearly absolute than at any other time since the war or than it ever was in the days of slavery."

Thus spoke James L. Tapp, president, general manager, and buyer of the James L. Tapp Co., of Columbia, S. C., which for 30 years has conducted the largest wholesale and retail department store in the State. Mr. Tapp has been here a week on one of his periodical buying trips, of which he usually makes 8 or 10 a year. But he said yesterday that he found it necessary to make several times the ordinary amount of February purchases of stock and that in consequence his present stay would be prolonged nearly a month. Mr. Tapp is a director in the Palmetto National Bank, of Columbia, and is largely interested in other enterprises of that city.

"I have been in business in Columbia 28 years," said Mr. Tapp, "and I never before saw trade so good as it is to-day. Our store did the largest and most profitable business in its history last year, and the volume of business so far this year is far ahead of 1913.

SEE GREATEST YEAR IN DECADE.

J. J. Selman, representing William Morris & Co., of No. 140 West Twenty-second Street, manufacturers of silk petticoats, and Lichtenstein, Reichlin & Co., of Philadelphia, manufacturers of silk dresses and waists, has just returned from a trip through the South and West. Mr. Selman said yesterday:

"I went as far south as Texas, and everywhere I found business good and the outlook even better. All through the South and West manufacturers and dealers are stocking up as if they expected 1914 to be the greatest business year in a decade. The South is too busy to pay any attention to the political pessimist."

Albert F. Rockwell, president of the New Departure Manufacturing Co., of Bristol, Conn., which employs 1,500 operatives and is running on full time, said, "That we regard business as good and expect it to be better is proved by the fact that we have just completed a large extension to our plant and are about to enlarge further by adding another building for our coaster-brake department."

C. E. Burch, of No. 45 West Thirty-fourth Street, New York buyer for Burch Bros. & Co., owners of dry goods stores in Waterloo, Marshalltown, and Mason City, Iowa, and Aberdeen, S. Dak.: "We have the largest dry goods stores in Iowa, and we can see nothing but prosperity ahead."

A. W. Burch, of Waterloo, Iowa, manager of Burch Bros. & Co.'s Waterloo store: "The West is in very good condition, and it is going from good to better. All the 100 factories in Waterloo have their entire output sold for the coming year. Prosperity prevails throughout Iowa."

1914 "YEAR OF PLENTY."

J. C. Ratcliff, buyer for the Battery Dry Goods Co., of Gaffney City, S. C.: "Business is very good with us and with merchants and manufacturers of South Carolina and the South generally. In fact, we are too busy to think of any possible interruption of prosperity, and there are no indications, so far as I can see, that 1914 will not be a year of plenty and happiness."

THE MEN WHO KNOW BEST.

In interviews with well-known manufacturers occupying a half page of yesterday's issue sentiments such as these were uttered:

R. L. Prather, Boston: "We feel absolutely optimistic, and our sales are excellent."

F. R. Maxwell, Boston: "The fundamental business conditions are all right; the situation only needs an optimistic spirit to make business boom."

H. T. Colwell, Newburgh, N. Y.: "The business outlook for the coming year never was better."

C. B. Hamilton, Grand Rapids, Mich.: "There is every prospect that 1914 will finish strong."

W. Laughlin, Chicago, Ill.: "The country is bound to be more prosperous."

O. B. Carson, Southbridge, Mass.: "The outlook is excellent."

F. I. Towle, St. Johnsbury, Vt.: "The southwestern territory is in particularly good condition."

A. B. Whitlock, Wheeling, W. Va.: "Our sales are ahead of 1913."

A. B. Pfeiffer, Chicago, Ill.: "Prospects for a big business year."

Frank G. Drew, New Haven, Conn.: "The outlook is very encouraging."

Davis H. Reddie, Springfield, Mass.: "Prosperity is in store for us."

Edward Fleshi, Milwaukee, Wis.: "Nineteen hundred and fourteen will be a splendid year for business."

[From the New York Herald, Feb. 20, 1914.]

"The year 1914 should be the greatest in the history of our State." This is the statement of Robert Newton Lynch, the president and manager of the Chamber of Commerce of San Francisco. Mr. Lynch added: "As far as we have learned from our business contact with other States throughout the country, there is a general rise in confidence all around and a thoroughly optimistic look."

Concerning employment conditions in the West, Mr. Lynch declared that, while labor demands were being met, the supply does not exceed the demand, save in seasonal employments.

TRADE CONDITIONS.

INDICATIONS FOR GOOD SPRING TRADE.

A. V. Hamburg, president of the Newark Board of Trade, said: "Business is pretty good and orders are coming in well, with indications that the spring trade we are preparing for will materialize."

Attention was called yesterday by an important business man to an anomalous condition faced by the Daily Iron Trade, a Cleveland publication, which about a month ago undertook to collect proof that there was wide depression in the iron, steel, and metal trades of the United States. He exhibited a copy of the publication to show that its own news articles contradicted that assumption. On January 16 last the front page of the Daily Iron Trade, which is an organ for the industry, contained an article under this heading: "Steel trade backs up idle workmen statements."

On page 3 of the same issue appear articles under the following heads: "Structurals in better demand," "See big rail tonnage," "Sheets appear of firmer tone," "Puddling mills to resume work," "Buffalo sold much," "Wire goods in better demand," "Larger bar tonnage."

TEXTILES.

Herman W. Block, of the S. S. Stein Co., said: "Letters we are receiving from retailers and from our agents everywhere speak hopefully of the future. Orders which we are receiving are unusually large for this time of the year."

TYPEWRITING BUSINESS.

The typewriter industry never was more prosperous or more promising than it is now, according to Harry Bates, of the Underwood Typewriter Co., in its head offices in the Underwood Building in Vesey Street.

"Instead of feeling any depressed business condition," he said, "we have been enjoying a continuous boom. Our business is better now than ever before, and contracts in hand indicate unmistakably that it is going to be better still.

"No one thought of crying hard times a year ago, yet business conditions everywhere, as indicated by our business, are better than they were a year ago.

WOMEN'S COSTUMES.

I. Lahm, of Lahm & Deutz, women's costume designers, at Nos. 33 and 39 West Thirty-fourth Street, said he expected the biggest season the firm ever has known.

"Already our sales for this year have exceeded by 10 per cent double the sales of this time last year," he said. "Our collections, which until recently were rather slow, are fine now, and our losses for the last several months have reached a minimum. I regard the promises of this business year as nothing short of phenomenal. Merchants who have come here to place their spring orders are actually sending in hurried reorders, saying that business in its present state promises so well that they do not want to be caught short handed. We find right now that our only trouble is the inability to fill orders, not to sell goods."

TRADE IN JEWELRY SPECIALTIES.

Charles Lippman, of the Lippman, Spier & Hahn Co., designers and wholesalers of jewelers' novelties, at No. 1261 Broadway, with branches all over the country and in Europe and South America, said: "Our business, I find, is an excellent index of general conditions. We sell largely to the big department stores, and they buy little of our goods when times are dull, because their customers do not buy many trinkets when they have little money. This year our sales have been heavy, and the quality of the goods has been excellent."

Matthias Stratton, of Alling & Co., manufacturing jewelers, said: "Storms have caused a cessation of orders in our line from the central western section of the country, but otherwise the trade is keeping up. Collections have improved since the first of the year, and jewelry manufacturers generally are working on full time making spring goods, the outlook being good for a brisk demand."

AUTOMOBILES.

From the automobile industry comes the particularly optimistic statement of Harry S. Houpt, president of the automobile company of that name, which deals principally in Lozier cars, at No. 1751 Broadway.

"This is the eleventh year I have been in the automobile business," said Mr. Haupt, "and in January and February of this year I have been more successful than in any other two months since I began. Since the first of the year I have outsold the previous best two months by 14 automobiles."

Arthur B. Underwood, president and manager Riley-Klotz Co., makers of automobile accessories, said: "We are not as busy as we could be, but orders are coming in steadily, and we are hoping that the indications for a brisk trade revival this spring will materialize. There is nothing to croak about, and if the promised forward movement arrives on time we'll all be too busy to even shout for joy."

SANGUINE IN CLOTHING TRADE.

An indication of business conditions from the viewpoint of New York business men was shown in a statement by Maurice Brill, of Brill Bros., dealers in men's wearing apparel. "Everyone in our line of business is sanguine," said Mr. Brill. "Manufacturers and importers are going ahead as fast as ever."

SHOES AND LEATHER.

Johnson & Murphy, shoe manufacturers, reported a full force, working full time. The season is regarded as a good one, with bright prospects for spring trade.

Weingarten Bros.' corset manufactory is running full time, with a force of about 1,500 workers. Sales for January exceeded those for the same month last year and big orders are coming in.

Whitehead & Hoag, manufacturers of badges, buttons, and novelties, have between 750 and 800 hands working full time, a larger force than was employed a year ago.

Peter Loehnberg, Atlantic Leather Co., said: "The leather trade has picked up considerably during the last few weeks. Orders are coming in and there are indications that within the next 60 days the leather-making industry will be humming along at a great rate."

BRIDGEPORT FACTORIES WORKING TO CAPACITY.

BRIDGEPORT, CONN.

Threatened disturbances in business having been found mythical, factories here are working at capacity and some of them overtime to meet demands of their trade. Among others, the Union Metallic Cartridge Co. is working overtime.

D. W. Wheeler, secretary of the Acme Shear Co., said: "The business outlook is very good. We can see good business ahead."

S. T. Davis, jr., president Locomobile Co. of America, said: "As far as our own business is concerned, we know that the tendency is toward improvement. The general sentiment throughout the country is optimistic."

F. J. Kingsbury, president Bridgeport Brass Co., said: "Business is better with us now than at the close of last year. The outlook is for a steadier business than last year."

C. E. Woods, manager of the American Graphophone Co., said: "Up to January 1 we never had such big business, and business at the present is about 20 per cent ahead of last year. There has been no diminution in the export trade."

Charles V. Barrington, secretary Crane Valve Co., said: "We are running full time in our plants here. Everything is picking up and conditions look good for the future. We are shipping to all parts of the United States."

Dever H. Warner, president Warner Bros. Co., manufacturers of corsets, employing 5,000 persons, said: "We look for normal conditions of business during the year and think that the work being done is bound to be a benefit to the country. We believe that the tariff will adjust itself and that from every viewpoint business is bound to be good. Our export business is increasing."

F. E. Basketz, superintendent of the Fletcher Engineering Co., said: "The business outlook in this country is good. We expect a big year not only from the building operations which have already begun, but from contracts upon which we are asked to bid."

Charles Hutchinson, treasurer Barnum & Bailey Circus, said: "We are expecting one of the biggest years in the circus business which we ever have known. The seating capacity of our big tent has been increased several thousand."

Thomas J. Seward, superintendent Electric Cable Co., said: "With a quiet beginning, we look forward to a good business. Our factory is working full time, with new business in sight for March and April. This is an extremely good outlook for what is usually a bad season."

Lynn W. Wilson said: "Business should be better than normal during the year. Many concerns here are putting on help, and some few are working overtime. At this season of the year outdoor workers are usually without employment. When outdoor occupations are resumed in the spring it will be discovered that the scale of employment is greater than it was a year earlier."

[From the New York Herald, Feb. 21, 1914.]

MANUFACTURERS REPRESENTING $500,000,000, IN PROSPERITY CONFERENCES HERE, SEE GREAT BUSINESS YEAR AHEAD.

Sounding a note of present and forthcoming prosperity and of confidence in the stability of the fundamental business principles of this country, more than 50 prominent manufacturers, representing $500,-

000,000 of invested capital, met yesterday at the Waldorf-Astoria to consider cooperation for immediate expenditures that would develop trade and bring added volumes of business in the revival that they predict is near at hand.

C. L. Forgey, representing Berry Bros., varnish manufacturers: "This year looks fine for us. We have received orders for fine baking japans for use by concerns in Milan, Italy, and Turin. Business is fine, and the prospects are bright. Our Detroit, Walkerville, and San Francisco factories are running all the time, and one branch of the Detroit plant is running day and night."

R. L. Prather, advertising manager of the Thomas G. Plant Co., Boston: "We manufacture fine shoes for women. Naturally we come into contact with the best stores not only in America but abroad. GOOD OUTLOOK FOR SHOE TRADE.

F. R. Maxwell, vice president of the Thomas G. Plant Co., Boston, shoe manufacturers: "The fundamental business conditions are all right."

H. T. Coldwell, assistant general manager and secretary of the Coldwell Lawn Mower Co., Newburgh, N. Y.: "There is every reason to say that the business outlook for the coming year never was better. It is so with us. Conditions are good for prosperity, and we are going to have a corking year."

FINE PROSPECTS FOR FURNITURE.

C. B. Hamilton, of the Berkey & Gay Furniture Co., Grand Rapids, Mich.: "There is every prospect that 1914, while it has started slow, will finish strong. Retail stocks are low, and every condition points to a successful year."

O. B. Carson, advertising manager of the American Optical Co., Southbridge, Mass.: "The outlook for the current year is excellent. Present business is most encouraging. It started slow for the year, but bids fair to end with record business. We have felt no hard times since President Wilson went into office, and we are expecting a general improvement all around."

Frank I. Towle, of the Towle Maple Products Co., St. Paul, Minn., and St. Johnsbury, Vt.: "From reports given to us by our salesmen throughout the section west of Chicago we find the southwestern territory in particularly good business and financial condition."

A. B. Whitlock, New York representative of the Hazel-Atlas Glass Co., Wheeling, W. Va.: "Our sales are ahead of the same period in 1913. The prospect is good for the rest of the year."

A. F. Pfeiffer, representing Armour & Co., Chicago: "Prospects and conditions are encouraging for a big business year."

Frank G. Drew, sales manager of the Winchester Repeating Arms Co., New Haven: "Business at present is normal with us. The outlook for 1914 is very encouraging."

John Rickaby, of the Towle Maple Products Co., St. Paul, Minn.: "The business outlook is, in our opinion, favorable for healthy progress in all legitimate lines."

John J. Gardiner, sales manager of the Hull Bros.' Umbrella Co., of Toledo, Ohio: "We have every reason to believe this will be our banner year."

Eben C. Speiden, of the International Acheson Graphite Co., Niagara Falls: "Prospects and conditions are encouraging. The Rice Leaders of the World Association represents the most powerful force for the promotion of clean and honest business that ever existed in this or any other country."

Charles M. Steele, vice president and general manager of the Carl M. Green Advertising Agency, Detroit, representing Berry Bros. (Inc.) and the Anderson Electric Car Co.: "Automobile and other business in Detroit shows marked improvement. The outlook for the year is very bright."

FACTORIES RUNNING OVERTIME.

Francis D. Bowman, advertising manager of the Carborundum Co., of Niagara Falls: "We sell grinding wheels and other abrasive products to the factories of the world. When factories are running, our products move. At present our plant is running overtime to meet demands. The manufacture of grinding wheels and grinding products is a splendid trade barometer."

George U. Crocker, president of the Simplex Electric Heating Co., of Cambridge, Mass.: "A period of readjustment to new business ideals is closing, and a period of advance under new conditions is in sight."

H. H. Whiting, Pillsbury Flour Mills Co., of Minneapolis, Minn.: "The business outlook is very encouraging at the present time."

P. C. Ludlam, general sales manager of the Coldwell Lawn Mower Co., Newburgh, N. Y.: "Business prospects are excellent, and the Rice Leaders of the World Association will materially improve the already prosperous business conditions."

Philip F. Hall, National Veneer Products Co., of Mishawaka, Ind.: "Business is 35 per cent ahead of last year, and it looks as if we will hold it for a year."

BUSINESS IN GLASSWARE GOOD.

J. C. Brady, vice president of the Hazel-Atlas Glass Co., Wheeling, W. Va.: "Judging solely from our own business, general conditions and prospects are good."

E. C. Waidvogel, assistant general manager of the Yale & Towne Manufacturing Co.: "Business for 1914 will be up to the normal, with more to come."

Lothar W. Faber, of the Eberhard-Faber Pencil Co.: "Present business conditions are normal. The future prospects are favorable, unless interfered with through legislative action."

A. G. Baker, vice president of the Niagara Silk Mills, of North Tonawanda, N. Y.: "Conditions are promising for a good year, and there is every indication of a returning confidence and prosperity."

W. C. Anderson, president of the Anderson Electric Car Co.: "The future depends upon the action of legislation on railroads and corporations. Give prosperity a chance and we will have it."

At the banquet last night at the Waldorf, Job E. Hedges presided, and speeches were made by Isaac F. Marcosson and William B. Howland.

VOTE OF THANKS TO THE HERALD.

Felicitous speeches were made also by C. B. Hamilton, of the Berkey & Gay Furniture Co., of Grand Rapids; H. Seymour, of the L. E. Waterman Co.; E. Eaton, of the Eaton, Crane & Pike Co.; F. R. Maxwell, vice president of the Thomas G. Plant Co.; and Mr. Rice, all of whom had a tone of hopefulness and praised the purposes of the association.

Mr. Hedges brought up the matter of the Herald's attention to prosperous companies, and said that, as this newspaper had exerted itself toward expressing the optimistic side of the situation, he thought it was in keeping with the purposes of the association to extend a vote of thanks. David H. Reddie, of the Smith & Wesson Co., put the question in the form of a motion, and Edward Freshl, president of the Holeproof Hosiery Co., seconded it. Mr. Hedges then put the subject to a vote, and it was passed unanimously.

Nathan Straus, of New York: "We are entering what will be the greatest era of prosperity the country has known. The grip of Wall Street on the United States has been shaken off by the new currency law. It means that all parts of the country may act on their own initiative without being compelled to consult Wall Street."

B. J. Greenhut, of the Greenhut-Siegel Cooper Co., said there is not the slightest indication of slackening in the speed of business in his house, and in coming in contact with others in the same and associated lines he has learned, he said, that the same feeling of confidence is firmly established throughout the country. There are as many employees at work in the various great business houses throughout the city as there were a year ago, and as far as the Greenhut-Siegel Cooper Co. is concerned, said Mr. Greenhut, business is very healthy, indeed, and everyone is busy.

GLASS.

Commending the Herald's reports on the business situation, Representative Edwin S. Underhill, of New York, in an interview to-day called attention to the boom conditions in the glass industry. He said:

"It may be of interest to the Herald to know that the Corning (N. Y.) Glass Works is at present enjoying a period of the greatest activity since its establishment, 40 years ago. It is the largest glass factory in the United States, employing upward of 1,500 persons. It never employed so many men before and its pay roll was never so large.

"Corning's leading paper states that the pay roll last week was nearly 30 per cent higher than the corresponding period a year ago, and that one of the blowers received $45 for his week's work on the piecework basis, on which the factory operates."

[From New York Journal of Commerce, Feb. 3, 1914.]

NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF CREDIT MEN ON BUSINESS OUTLOOK.

That business men are more cheerful regarding the outlook is asserted in the February circular letter issued yesterday by the National Association of Credit Men. It says:

"The first month of the new year has clearly given a new note to business. Uncertainty as to what was going to happen next has been giving way during the month to definiteness. Instead of pursuing a policy of self-protection, as business men have thought necessary for several years, they may look forward, in lines where stocks have not been carried over on account of unseasonable weather, with genuine confidence, working aggressively and expansively for business.

"There is a world-wide ease in the money market, a condition almost novel, so long is it since we have been free from financial stress and strain in one or more of the world's centers.

"This note of cheer does not mean that we need be less vigilant in keeping receivables well under control, for no matter how favorable business prospects may be, anything but a close-collection policy is bad business.

"It is obvious, from reports reaching the national office, that during the last two months of 1913 slowness in the settlement of merchandise accounts was general. There are two distinctive reasons for this condition: First, unseasonable weather operating against sales of winter stocks; and, second, timidity on the part of the interior banks pending banking and currency legislation."

[From the St. Louis Republic, Feb. 12, 1914.]

GENERAL BUSINESS.

The marked changes in financial conditions in New York to-day are harbingers of a period of great prosperity, according to Ben Altheimer, president of the Altheimer & Rawlings Investment Co., who has just returned from the East.

"There is money everywhere for investment. Interest and discount rates have been lowered. Commercial paper in large amounts is being bought up rapidly by the banks, and new issues of securities are absorbed as quickly as they are offered.

"Banking houses that had prepared February bond circulars to mail to their clients were compelled to withhold them, as the securities were disposed of without the necessity of circularizing.

"Whether this is a natural reaction from the lethargy of business that existed a few months ago, or whether it is caused by the demand resulting from prosperity, I can not say. It is certain, however, that confidence has been restored here and abroad, and Wall Street has proved again that it is not only cold and practical, but also sensitive and sentimental—a contradiction, but a fact.

The big bankers of Chicago are a unit in their belief that the year 1914 will bring an era of general prosperity and a resumption of business activity in centers where there has been an undeniable depression.

John Wanamaker, at a Union League dinner, sounded a note of optimism by declaring that he had no fear of any serious unsettlement of business or of any long disturbance of prosperity.

A sane and sober optimism is the dominant note in the trade forecasts of bankers and business men published in the annual financial section of the Times yesterday. * * * In the first place, the business year 1913 was not a bad one. * * * Very soon everybody will get over being afraid, men will see that there is no reason for fear; they will cease looking for causes of alarm and timidity. Then, other conditions being unquestionably favorable, the country will find itself in the midst of prosperity.

From many quarters both here and in Europe the closing week of the year brought signs of returning optimism in financial quarters. Bankers of international repute were understood to have become "increasingly sanguine," the chief reason being an approaching end to a world-wide tension in money.

One of the best-known bank presidents in Chicago was quoted as having said in public just after Christmas that the currency bill as modified and passed was "a good thing for the entire country and would start the wheels of prosperity rolling again." A prominent business man in Boston declared his belief that the country was "on the eve of the greatest prosperity ever known." The tariff and currency bills he thought would "bring new life and spirit into business." The boom, in his opinion, would be well under way by the fall of 1914.

Mr. E. J. Cattell, city statistician of Philadelphia, said the Nation was facing an era of prosperity "beyond any known in any country of the world at any period" because of greater agricultural production and output of mines.

In Mr. James J. Hill's opinion, basic conditions were sound and business would soon be showing signs of great national prosperity.

Andrew Carnegie takes an optimistic view of economic and industrial conditions. "No country," he said, "travels ahead at a uniform pace. They all have their periods of prosperity and depression. But no country in the world has such prospects as our own Republic. * * * Our exports and imports show the situation clearly."

Walton H. Marshall, managing director of the Vanderbilt, got back yesterday from a business trip through the South as far as New Orleans and reported that everywhere business was booming.

With these figures [used by Secretary Redfield before the Raleigh Chamber of Commerce] in mind, the Democratic Philadelphia Record points out that "the country is doing more business under the Underwood tariff than it did under the Payne-Aldrich tariff." Secretary Redfield's optimism is shared by the steel men who recently gathered in New York. Judge Gary thinks prosperity is at hand. President Thomas, of the Briar Hill Steel Co., of Youngstown, Ohio, says, "We are in the swing now and may shortly expect a remarkable period of expansion." These men agree that conditions are fundamentally sound. And meanwhile, notes the Baltimore Sun, "bumper wheat and fruit crops are predicted, bank clearings are running along greater than they were last year, and the cost of living, as shown by the index numbers, has decreased." The same story, says the New York Herald, "is told by recent comparative increase in the earnings of a number of the railways. Pittsburgh tells of greater purchases of basic pig iron—the inevitable forerunner of greater demand for finished steel products. Fall River notes an improved inquiry for cotton textiles. And so runs the better feeling through the whole cycle of industries. * * * There are signs on every side that the period of retrenchment, economy, doubt, and gloom has ended and that the country is about to enter upon an era of expansion and prosperity."

Col Robert M. Thompson, chairman of the International Nickel Co., just returned after nearly four months in Europe, was yesterday quoted as saying that business was better in the United States than it was abroad.

"Cheer up! I agree with the President that the era of prosperity is coming fast," said Henry Ford on leaving the White House to-day. Mr. Ford pleased the President by telling him that the tariff had not caused business depression.

Signs of the early revival of business, which were abundant in the reports from authoritative sources all over the country published in yesterday's Times, are multiplied in to-day's news. There are more buyers from every part of the United States in town to-day than ever before at this time of the year, and the list of them fills two columns and a half of print.

John V. Farwell, head of the wholesale dry-goods firm of J. V. Farwell & Co., asserted to-day that prosperity already was here.

But even in steel and iron there are reports of better times. Take, for instance, this announcement from a Republican paper, the Pittsburgh Telegraph: "Pittsburgh is returning to its old-time prosperity. This is the opinion voiced by leading manufacturers, bankers, and business men of the community. All branches of trade are feeling the stimulus of the return of normal conditions. * * * Reports in the iron and steel industry for July in the Pittsburgh district show an increase over June of 10 per cent. For August, the outlook is still better." The Iron Age reports that "the corner seems to have been turned at last" in the steel trade, and tells of manufacturers shortening their usual mid-year shutdowns for inventories and repairs because of demands from customers.

Several newspapers are encouraged by the Pennsylvania Railroad's recent order for 81 new locomotives, 1,000 all-steel freight cars, and 100,000 tons of new steel rails. Men laid off at this road's Altoona shops have returned and additional workmen have been required. The New York Commercial and other authorities report a "more liberal buying on the part of railroads." The Wall Street Journal tells of a most encouraging outlook for a large demand for coal in the fall. Several business authorities, including the American Wool and Cotton Reporter and Marshall Field & Co.'s weekly trade review, speak of growing activity in textiles. Delegates to a New York convention of the National Leather and Shoe Finders' Association gave out most optimistic statements to the press, making, as the Jersey City Journal (Ind.) puts it, "an assault upon the calamity howlers that will long be remembered."
